A constitutional lawyer says the decision to suspend a University of Saskatchewan surgeon from his teaching duties because he raised concerns about vaccinating children without informed consent is a violation of his charter of rights.

Dr. Francis Christian, a clinical professor and practicing physician of general surgery at the University of Saskatchewan, was called to a meeting on June 23, where he was informed of his suspension, while the university was informed about his conduct and social media. reviews activities. Depending on the result, he may be terminated from his post in September.

an attorney with the Justice Center for Constitutional Freedom, a non-profit legal organization that represents christian, said his suspension is illegal because "it is a breach of contract and has been done for censorship purposes."

"It is our position that Dr. Christian's termination is illegal, a violation of his charter-protected right to freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression, and a betrayal of the principles of scientific inquiry," said Jay Cameron, litigation director at the Justice Center told The Epoch Times.

In June 17 statement To the media that was also released to more than 200 doctors, Christian – who he says is a “very pro-vaccine doctor” – has called for the m-RNA COVID vaccine to be given to children under the age of 12. expressed concern about

“Before vaccination for children is introduced, both children and parents should be made aware of the risks of m-RNA vaccines to children, any benefits to children, and any alternatives to vaccines,” they wrote, adding informed consent. described as “a sacred doctrine”. “

“This should particularly apply to a new vaccine that has never been tried before in humans.”

He said that COVID-19 does not pose a threat to children, but noted that the vaccine is already causing “serious medical problems” for children due to the increased risk of myocarditis (inflammation of the heart).

“This is enough for the German National Vaccine Agency not to recommend the vaccine to healthy children and adolescents,” he wrote. “According to a report in the Daily Telegraph, the UK’s Vaccine Agency is also not authorizing a vaccine for children.”

In a June 21 letter to Christian, the Saskatchewan Health Authority and the University of Saskatchewan College of Medicine said they have “received information that you are designed to discourage and prevent children and adolescents from receiving COVID-19 vaccinations contrary to recommendations.” Engage in the activities undertaken and pandemic-response efforts of public health officials in Saskatchewan and Canada,” according to the Center for Justice.

The Saskatchewan Health Authority (SHA) said in an emailed statement to The Epoch Times that it is exercising its right to terminate the contractual relationship with Christian under a provincial academic clinical funding plan agreement.

“The SHA would like to reaffirm that it does not endorse or support the spread of misinformation that is not related to the severity of COVID-19, the scientific validity of this epidemiology and the extent to which COVID vaccination is available,” the statement said. casts doubt on its effectiveness.

“While we respect that Saskatchewan residents have a right to freedom of expression, health system leaders are expected to commit to a fact-based, scientifically driven public message.”

The Justice Center is currently representing a number of health professionals who are facing discipline for questioning COVID-19 public health measures.

"Colleges of physicians have become a sort of new investigation, where scientists and doctors who question prevailing stereotypes are censored, punished and maligned," Cameron said.

"Doctors and nurses have freedom of speech, and the professional punishment for engaging in public scientific debate is deeply troubling. Health care workers simply do not give up their constitutional rights by working for a government-controlled health body. Should not be punished just because they refuse to parrot the popular COVID mantra."
