

STUDENTS CALL FOR DEMONSTRATION

At the largest political meeting of students at Memorial since 1972 the Student's Union announced its first victory in its campaign to lessen the effects of the PC Government's newly announced education policy.

After negotiation with Student Representatives, the Provincial Government issued a "clarification of policy" when it stated that the increases in the student aid policy would not come into effect until September, thus saving summer students $250.00 each.

The central theme through all seven speakers at the meeting was asserted by Steve Delaney, the newly appointed Vice-President in charge of External Affairs. He said, quoting University President M. O. Morgan, that "students will be paying more for a lower quality of education."

Delaney told students that, as of September first they will have to borrow $700.00 before becoming eligible for a Provincial Grant.

Previously, a student was only required to borrow $450.00 before their grant.

If a student completed his degree programme, he will have to pay $91.00 a month for ten years more to repay his loan. Under the old program it would have been a payment of $58.00 a month.

With the probable rise in interest rates, this would again increase the overall amount that students would be required to repay.

Tom Lafosse, the President of the Newfoundland Teachers Association, told students that although last year there was an overall "budget for education in this province of 15 million dollars, it needed an increase of 22 million just to put an equal amount in," and keep pace with inflation.

He said that, "the government has lost its sense of direction, its sense of priorities."

"In 1976-77," he said, "30.6% of the Provincial Budget went to education, last year 28%, and this year its down to 26.5%."

Dick Ellis of Memorial's Faculty Association said that there seemed a "lack of political will to support the university."

He said the universities budget was "not an outrageous request," pointing to the Maritime universities' average budget increases of 7%, while Newfoundland's Memorial received only a 4.5% increase in its operating budget.

Gene Long of the National Union of Students told MUN students that "the exact same thing is happening in the rest of Canada."

Alberta's and Ontario's universities only received a 5.5% increase he said and on Friday of this week students would be meeting in Manitoba for the same reasons. Their increase was only 2.5%.

Dr. Eaton, the university Vice-President responsible for Student Affairs, told the students that the CSU should be complemented for their success in delaying student aid increases.

He went on to pledge continued support for the CSU.

Jim Payne expressed frustration over the "greed of the private sector" and the irresponsible Provincial and Federal Governments.

"Screwed" is how he described the plight of students in any post-secondary educational institution and he criticized the Federal make-work programmes for putting off the real unemployment problem.

The students were shaken by the barrage of bad news that confronted them and the question/answer turned into a call for an immediate demonstration of their discontents with government by marching to the Confederation Building.

The student representatives on hand asked students to delay three enthusiasm for they wishes to continue negotiations with the government over the summer months and if action is needed in September, then would be the time for a possible boycott of classes or mass demonstration.

But those attending Wednesday's meetings pressed for more immediate action and finally Ralph Trask responded by calling as meeting for yesterday, 3 o'clock.

A news conference was held a noon yesterday to discount media reports that the CSU as an organization were supporting the call for a demonstration.

Kevin Saunders and Steve Delaney both executives told the MUSE that the majority of students they talked to were not in favour of any action until more negotiations with the government.

Up to news time, no firm decision had been made.

Nutrition on Campus

During this semester a nutrition survey was carried out on campus. 533 students from 10 faculties completed a questionnaire designed to assess weight, eating habits, food intake and exercise level. This represented 11% of the full-time student population.

The survey was initiated by the Director of Student Health at Memorial and carried out by a student from the School of Nursing. The purpose of the survey was to assess the present nutritional status of students and to determine existing lifestyles which, if continued, may be detrimental to future health.

Lifestyle habits are learned and by adolescence (age of 70% of students sampled) are well established in each individual. It is assumed that one's lifestyle at adolescence will continue as such into early adulthood and middle age.

Major Findings of the Survey Are:

1. Thirty percent of population are overweight and obese. This would suggest that obesity is not a condition restricted to middle-aged females but is prevalent in our university population. The incidence of obesity was greater in males than females ie., 2:1. As our results did not find a relationship between obesity and types or amount of foods eaten, it suggests the probability of another variable we did not measure. We question the possibility that alcohol consumption may be a significant factor in the percentage of obesity but this would require further studies.
2. Canada's Food Guide served to measure food intake. According to its recommendations, fifty percent of the adolescent population (16-20 yrs) were deficit in Milk/...Milk products.
3. Seventy-Five percent of total population were deficit in Bread/Cereals.
4. Eighty percent of total population were deficit in Fruits/Vegetables.
5. Only ten percent of females and twenty percent of males on campus have ideal exercise levels: Students studying for the health professions ie., Medicine and Nursing had the lowest percent with ideal exercise levels for all faculties tested. Does this mean that the majority of students tested are lazy? Could it be that work load during semester are such that fitness must take a back seat to study. How does the saying go "A sound mind makes a sound body" or "A sound body makes a sound mind?" Both are important to good health but the "sound body" is obviously in short supply on this campus. Don't you think it is time we "SHAPE UP?"

Increases

WINNIPEG (CUP) — Textbook prices in Canada will probably be 10 to 15 per cent higher in September, University of Manitoba bookstore manager Helen Garlicki said March 27.

The bulk of textbooks used in Canadian colleges and universities are imported from the United States, she said, and the declining value of the Canadian dollar will mean higher prices in Canada.

"We'll have to add whatever the exchange rate is to the price of books when we buy them," she said.

"Our major buying is in May, June and July so it depends mostly on the exchange rate at that time."

But she said Canadian distributors will already have some books in stock or may order some earlier from the U.S. parent companies.

Elementary and secondary school texts won't be affected because most of them are produced in Canada.

But, say publishers, the Canadian market is too small and fragmented to permit domestic production of most books and materials used in post-secondary schools.

Higher tuition fees and cutbacks in education (particularly library) spending will further restrain the market.

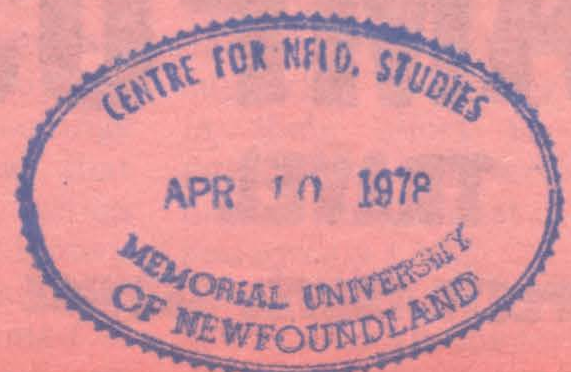

But the executive director of the Canadian Publisher's Council, a trade association, has said he expects a government announcement before summer on a proposal to end import duties on some materials.

Tuition Fees To Rise In Manitoba :

WINNIPEG (CUP) — It's official: University of Winnipeg tuition fees are going up 23.5 per cent.

The university's board of regents decided that March 27 just a few hours after 350 students demonstrated against fee increases as board members arrived on campus for their monthly meeting.

The fee increase is less, however, than the 27 per cent increase recommended by the Manitoba government's universities grants commission two weeks earlier when it gave the U of W an increase in funding of just 1.1 per cent.

That would have increased fees from the present $425 a year to $540 instead of the $525 decided March 27.

The increase is included in the U of W's 1978-79 budget of just more than $11 million, as is a $280,000 deficit.

The university is also establishing a $45,000 bursary fund from endowment revenue to help needy students who can't afford the fee increases and other rising costs.

The protest, the compromise fee increase and the bursary fund were carefully arranged by the administration and student council executive.

As the board members arrived, the 350 demonstrators lined the halls and stairs leading to the board's meeting room and waved placards and shouted slogans: "Freeze the fees, freeze the fees, freeze the fees," and "We can't pay, we can't pay, we can't pay."

Seeming very uncomfortable, most board members looked straight ahead as they scurried between the lines of students.

Others paused to look at some of the placards: "Education is a right, not a privilege," "I don't have 27 per cent more," "Degrees are earned, not bought," and "What about your child?"

When all board members had arrived the students were led outside to the front lawn of the university where they continued to chant slogans.

And then a new slogan, borrowed from the March 16 student demonstration at the Ontario legislature: "Harry, Harry, Harry."

Right on cue the U of W's own Harry, administration president Harry Duckworth, appeared on the front steps. Carrying a placard — "Fees no higher than necessary" — he invited the students into the university's Convocation Hall.

About 200 accepted and heard Duckworth congratulate them — "You sure know how to put on a demonstration" — and then spend 10 minutes outlining the university's financial position.

He said the university had been "doubly penalized by the universities grants commission." The U of W didn't raise its fees last year when the other Manitoba universities did. With less revenue from fees, the U of W is now getting less in provincial government funding as well.

And he said an unnamed source told him that morning that a U of W failure to increase fees as recommended would mean less provincial government funding in future.

He spoke of the many financially needed students at the university and announced the plan for the bursary fund.

A dozen students responded to Duckworth in the following 45 minutes, most of them urging that he and the board demand more funding from the provincial government.

They urged him to cancel classes on April 6 and lead a planned march of students and faculty from all three Manitoba universities on the provincial legislature that day.

Duckworth refused, saying that he refused to say what they are.

The demand was repeated: "You're letting the government walk all over you. Make a stand and get them (the Progressive Conservatives) the hell out of government."

"That's a political statement," said Duckworth. "I suggest you make that on April 6."

"Let us" shouted one student and then another and then dozens. "Let us."

But Duckworth refused to participate in the march, though he said he would support that kind of activity if he were a student. "If I were in your position I would march with you."

Asked if he thought the proposed bursary fund would be big enough, Duckworth replied: "If the fund is oversubscribed we'll reconsider the amount." And he asked the student association to contribute to the bursary fund as well.

"I don't think the student association should provide money for bursaries," student association president Hart Schwartz replied. "The provincial government should." And, he said, "the university shouldn't provide money for bursaries, and by doing so it is accommodating the provincial government."

Schwartz then announced that the board had to begin meeting and that free coffee and doughnuts would be served to students in a nearby cafeteria. The students quietly left the Convocation Hall, most for the cafeteria. Schwartz and another student representative on the board went to the board meeting.

When he emerged several hours later, Schwartz said the board spent more than two hours debating attempts by student members to increase fees only to $500. The amendment to the main motion lost by a 13-9 vote, he said.

Council of the Students' Union

Dear Mr. Trask:

I am writing this letter to you in support of the efforts of your Council with the provincial government to persuade it that the Canada Student Loan portion of student aid not be increased to $700.00 from the present $450.00.

As we are all aware, University education is expensive. A great many students, with their families, incur a considerable debt in successfully concluding a four or five year degree programme at Memorial. The repayment schedule for these loans places a very heavy burden on both family and student. All too often these bright students come from homes which are hard pressed to meet the daily costs of living.

With these thoughts in mind, I have a great fear that many deserving and intelligent students from such homes will be discouraged from attending University. This would be a tragedy not only for the student but also for society at large.

Accordingly, I support your efforts in this regard and wish you the best of luck with your negotiations with government.

Yours sincerely,
J. Douglas Eaton, Ph. D.,
Vice-President
(Student Affairs & Services).

Trask Plans Long Range Campaign

"As Long As We Have Support Of Students, We'll Take It As Far As We Can Take It." - R. Trask.

By Harry Kierans

Ralph Trask, President of the Council of the Student's Union, has promised to "take it as far as we can take it" in terms of helping students persuade the provincial government to reverse their decision to reduce the amount of money loaned to Memorial University.

Trask stated that the basic rationale behind the budget decreases from the provincial government was to "increase the amount of money for them to spend" and that "everybody had been looking at the students as a means of making money". He said that the ramifications towards the student of the new budget ceilings were many-fold; "We know that residence costs will increase, tuition costs will rise, the amount of money going into student aid will increase that $700 will have to be granted in loans to a student before a grant can be taken by that student. A typical student may owe about $7,000.00 in loans before graduating. He said the amount of money a student will have to pay back is our chief concern".

Trask plans a large-scale campaign to turn back the budget decrease. "We plan to discuss it with the Administration, the Government, and the Opposition - on April 5th we will inform students what we have achieved and the Public will be informed as well. We also expect about 5,000 names in a Petition that is circulating around campus." Trask added that they have obtained the full support of the Corner Brook campus in their effort to persuade the government to reverse its decision to increase the budget to the University and by only 4.3%.

He added that "the National Union of Students will support the Council of the Students' Union in its protest".

THEATRE

By Tobias

Acting insanity — all vanity, lines within lines, intertwines giving reality — all dignity.

Fumbling stage-play, pulsating excitement, nervous tension and premature performances....Newfoundland drama is a pleasure.

The Arts and Culture Centre was my castle for a week. The annual display of Newfoundland drama marked a spiritual enlivening of the sufferings and work of actors, technicians and playwrights who seldom occupy the castle...The amateur theatrical companies of Newfoundland. I heard my long legs creak as I walked to the bar or explored the hidden recesses of the ponderous building. The depths of the basement are occupied by white coated kitchen help who scurry away from the sweltering heap of flesh that shouts orders. The dim corridors lead to an intimated theatre that serves as the all-purpose learning stage for many performers. The Newfoundland Drama Festival '78 activities began with a satirical, often funny, but sometimes embarrassing shit by the Festifal Players called Dramatitis. They provided light entertainment to the festival competitors and early arrivals to the castle.

The dust has settled on the main stage and the brighter moments of the plays occupy prominent positions in my memory — all others have decayed. The opening performance of the Festival was On Monday Next by the Freelance Players of St. John's. Sylvia Wig wirected, with Jim healy in the lead role and ed Kirby, Kelty Vourtier, Teri Snelgrove, John Carew and Ann Hubeny giving support to a nothing production. The play, by Philip King, was about the production of a play. The material, characters, comedy and meaning were totally unfamiliar to present day audiences and the attempt at unearthing nostalgia stunk. The bare-bones stage and misdirected intensity made even farce impossibly dull.

North-Cliffe Drama Club from Grand Falls presented Kennedy's Children on the second night of the festival. Intense individuals, who connected on one theme, the loss of a dream — hope in the future during the Kennedy regime, provided energy in a series of monologues that riddled minds, shooting holes in many beliefs. Personally, the play had monumental meaning — I can still see my teacher turning in the radio to Kennedy's assination...gay actors, draft dodgers, beauty queens and bars have occupied my mind during its tormented, demented growth in adolescence.

Cliff Allen plays a bartender who wanders in, turns on the lights, puts on the juke box, and shuffles about as "Something's Happening Here" by Buffalo Springfield echoes through his bar. One by one the characters enter and take up positions, Wanda (Cathy Dingwall) the would-be school teacher grieving over the loss of J.F.K., Sparger, gay actor, who paints scenes in blood, piss and cum (Mike Thomson). Rona, the sutudent revolutionary who has tripped on acid and gained meaning for life (Doreen Drummond). Mark, Nam Soldier, who runs around the Vietnam beaches with his buddies, stoned on mascaline — in jockey shorts — (Warren Down). Finally, Carla the beauty queen (Barbara Bennett) who "has been down in the lap of Manahattan. And went head first."

The players sustained a constant level of energy that gradually habituated becoming static since there was little actual movement of characters. The energy was there and was profoundly felt, leaving an unmistakable gouge in the way surface of my memory.

Like Father, Like Fun was presented by the Avion Players o of Gander. The play, written by Eric Nicoll, is light comedy centering on sex as the exploding element. Timing is essential to comedy and with Nicol's simple plot...(business tycoon (Ross Goldsworthy) wants his Dr. man (Jim Lewis) to solicit a sexual partner for his son to prevent an ensuing relationship and gets more than he bargained for)... it is most difficult to sustain the comedy. However, the Avion Players made Wednesday evening entertaining.

The substance of theatre is Shakespeare. Othello was presented on the fourth evening by the Bay Theatre from Stephenville. Unfortunately (?) I missed most of this performance — there was some mix up at the bar. What I did see, however affirmed my belief that Shakespeare has to be rendered into reality with professional confidence and understanding. I long to see Statfort Festivals. This production was underdeveloped, like the premature strangulation of Desdemona which should have tragic implications, however, the bed brought images of funnier premature performances.

The Playmakers of Corner Brook presented a dramatized selection of the works of Ted Russell. We've Got Things Here Even Stronger Than Dying including tales of Piegon Inlet...the humanity and reality of outport Newfoundland life. A sentimental, gentle, and wise author, Ted Russell's stories were humourously, perhaps a little too impersonally, rendered into a fine stage performance by the Corner Brook troupe. There were waves of uproarious laughter as Bob Richard's remarkable characterizations got everyone's goat. Dennis Mulcahy, the director, has produced a fine, first performance on Friday night.

The finale of the festival was Equus, by the Carol Players from Labrador City. This play, written by Peter Shaffer, developed from a macabre blinding of six houses by a derranged stable boy. The complex and charge drama that explodes with intensity of feeling is superb theatre. The boy (Ed Knight) is referred to a psychiatrist (gerry Doyle) and gradually reveals through flashback and interview, his innermost workings of the soul. As the analysis progresses the psychiatrist is lead into the depths of passions and despair and unwillingly realizes his own inconsequential existence. The hobby horse, is no stranger to the stage and the stylized horse masks worn by members of the company were as unsettling presence throughout the

One of the young-at-heart responds enthusiastically during last year's Atlantic Folk Festival. The 1978 Festival will take place August 3rd. through 6th. at Moxsom Farm.

For Immediate Release

Mark it on your calendar. August 3 — 6 the gatges of Moxsom Farm will open onto the Atlantic Folk Festival, 1978.

Once again, people of all ages and inteests will gather from all over the Atlantic provinces to participate in a "down-east" celebration of Atlantic Canadian culture through its music, its people, and the beautiful surroundings of the 700-acre Moxsom Farm.

For the fourth straight year, the Festival promises an impressive variety of music and activities. An exciting roster of performers is being lined up, soon to be announced, which includes a rich assortment of contemporary and traditional music of the region, old-timers, up-and-coming new artists, any old favourites, and even a special guest or two from the international folk milieu. There'll be food, crafts, three stages of entertainment, and "good times" for all.

This year, Festival organizers have announced that there will be a limited supply of tickets only, which must be purchased in advance. Tickets will go on sale at locations across the four provinces on June 1. They will also be available by mail order from that time.

Four days of camping and two full days of entertainment are in store at Hardwood Lans, 40-miles north of Halifax.

Watch for further announcements and remember to set aside August 3 — 6 for the Atlantic Folk Festival 1978.

entire performance. This convention has been used mostly for humour, but here is transposed into a significant vehicle of tragedy.

The boy, Allan Stang, is lead into the stables late at night by a girl (Charlotte Winters). Her motives are obvious (make love to Alan amongst the hay) but the horses are restless and their tramlings, tramlings about any attempt Allan makes to ensnare his passions in the web of mediocrity. His feelings reign supreme, to images of horses, horses, horses.

This difficult play was worked with spirit and style and was the best performance overall. In the final analysis, when images and scripts are destroyed by flames of criticism because they cannot match the quality of performances that occupy the hollows of the mind, personally, I have pedestled both Equus and Kennedy's Children.

The castle doors close and the artists return to Satan's suburb for another year of toil, turmoil and turbulence so that they may come again next year to show their bright carvings of humanity.

According to Lisa

By Glenda Murphy

In today's culture many people take time to plunge into the latest fad. One of the most common incentives for such endeavors is a concern for physical fitness, weight loss or both.

At present, the ancient Hindu art of yoga is enjoying an ever-increasing popularity as many "participation-conscious" people head out of their houses one or two nights a week to rejuvenate tired bodies. One likely destination is the studio of Lisa Schwartz.

Lisa, originally from California, has resided the past seven years in Newfoundland. Every weekday, from 9 am to 10 pm she offers a range of yoga classes from beginner to advanced, for young and old, male and female. It means a busy day but a satisfying one as many people learn the art that heals and builds, soothes and relaxes.

Lisa had been a student of yoga for many years before she decided to travel to India to study under B.K.S. Iyengar. Prior to this she had practised what most people might consider similar to "Kareen's Yoga" seen on daily television. However, although she had attained a great degree of flexibility, she had relatively little muscle strength. Upon finding the book by B.K.S. Iyengar she became quite impressed with this method that combined strength and stretch in a scholarly, precise way. At the time she had been looking for her 'guru' (Sanskrit word meaning "teacher") who could give her an in-depth appreciation of yoga. At first the book seemed almost too good since the postures were designed and performed by a man, namely Mr. Iyengar. Nonetheless, she began inquiring and writing letters to find out if this man was alive and if it was possible to study with him. "Somehow," says Lisa, "I ended up studying at the institute with him. Since then, Lisa has travelled to India twice for intensive courses with Iyengar as well as studied under him during his periodic trips to North America.

YOGA Has Many Goals

Yoga has many goals — flexibility, strength, health to name a few — though all are chiefly directed toward an ultimate balance of physical and mental well-being. For the beginner the stress is on alignment and posture. The core of all postures is a stance called "Tadasana." "If I had only one pose to teach, that's the one I would teach," says Lisa. Tadasana is a basic standing pose where the individual must achieve perfect bodily alignment from the toes to the head.

If you ask Lisa what yoga was she would probably tell you to find it up in the dictionary. According to her, the best observations are made by the students themselves. Instead of her telling the benefits, the student discovers them.

Therapeutic Value

Several students have found incredibly therapeutic results since they undertook a schedule of yoga. One woman, a mother of six children was troubled with a bad back for 17 years and had such bad kidney she could not do a forward bend. Her back is now "just about cleared up" and she can do practically any forward bend, a progress she attributes to yoga.

Similarly, a girl had physical ailments with the big toe that required surgery. She came to a yoga class, drew her foot and dated it. A couple of months later she drew her feet again... "They were really different." She never did have surgery and since then the same surgeon who studied her case has recommended many patients with foot disorders to yoga.

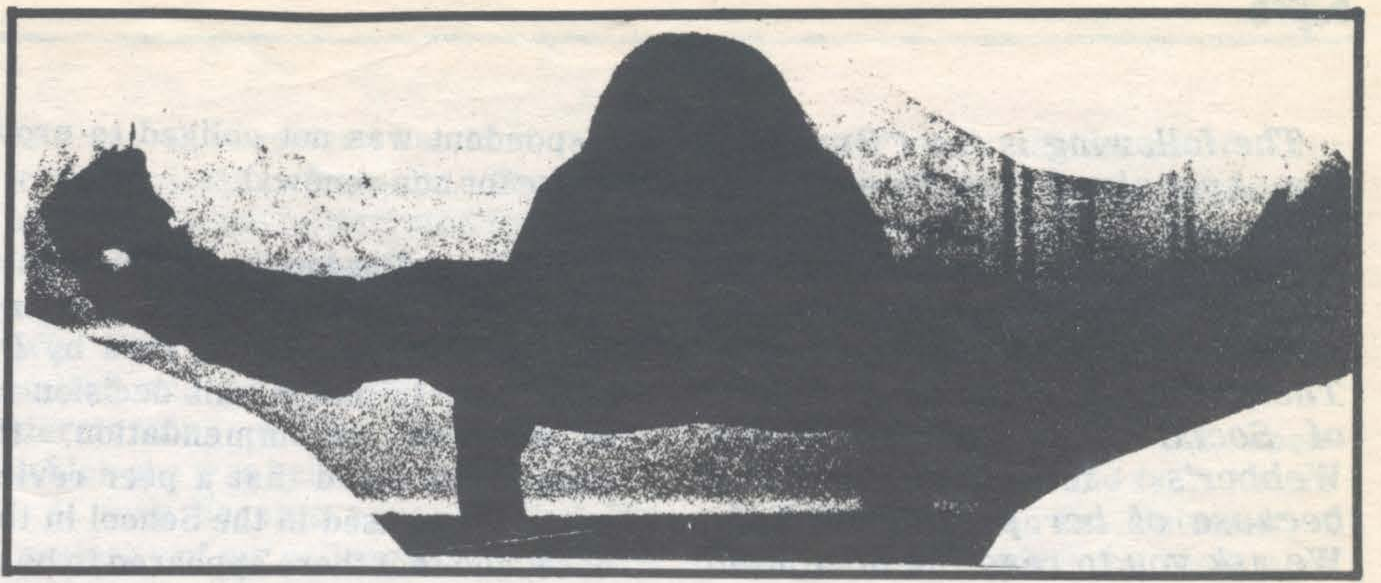

Lisa herself had experienced certain health problems. Two years ago she tore a cartilage in her leg (which she thinks was caused by her dancing since she is also a dancer). In March she had an operation and by May she was off to India to study with Iyengar. "Yoga put me together pretty fast," she says. For a year she taught yoga from a chair and modified postures to suite her position. "When anyone would do a pose the wrong way I would hit them with my crutches," she jokes. To her this proved that anything could be modified to suit a person's ability. It therefore showed a place for yoga in the lives of physically disabled persons.

Value for Men

Unfortunately, men are virtually unaware of the value this art holds for them. It is often due to mistaken notions or complete lack of any notion at all. As Lisa would say the "leotarded ladies" concept, as well as the fact that most classes are 95% women prove discouraging factors to men. She thinks it strange that in the east mostly women prove discouraging factors to men. She thinks it strange that in the east mostly men do yoga while in North America it is considered a woman's art. In fact, one of the distinctions between the Iyengar method and regular yoga is that it is very active. "It could have terrific value for athletes if they knew what it entailed."

Weight Control

As for weight loss what can yoga do? In a class of eleven senior students the majority said they never came to lose weight. One remark was "The only way to lose weight is to pull yourself from the table." However, one lady who did come with that intention lost fifteen pounds within a few months. Some people do manage to control their weight, perhaps due to the regulating effect that the postures exert on body metabolism. Lisa doesn't find many "fat" yoga students. She believes the reason to be the proportion and moderation which are part of yoga's discipline. And "overeating doesn't fit this" "Besides," says one student, "you look terrible in a leotard when you've got rolls."

Principles of Yoga

"looking at an orange"

What about the popular notions of yoga that it is an austere form of meditation? Or that it means staring at candles for an hour, or thinking about an orange. These are what most students believe to be common misleading conceptions. As for the fear of bodily harm, extension of the spine is not dangerous. Done incorrectly, bends can compress the spine, but spinal extension within a suitable range actually improve vitality. Yoga operates on the principle that the spinal cord is the seat of the entire nervous system. Hence, the many nerves that dwell within this nervous centre are responsible for the health of mind and body as a unified whole. When the spine is not exercised with the progression of the years, it becomes stiff. Together with the natural pull of gravity the aging process occurs perhaps more speedily than it should. The vertebrae become compressed, which means that tension becomes rooted in the spine. The result is often the familiar "kinly" feeling of a stiff back that many people experience even when they are under twenty. Sitting over desks for several hours a day and lack of physical exercise would therefore contribute greatly to its incidence. Stretching the spine releases tension and pressure, thereby promoting relaxation. Because of increased blood flow, vital organs receive an improved supply of oxygen and bodily functions are regulated. This achieves an overall sense of health and well-being.

The body must be in good working order before the mind can be in a happy state. Yoga contends that one can't exist without the other. The reasoning is obvious.

Of course, anyone who has health problems must be cautious and consult a physician before launching into a vigorous yoga workout. As with any art or sport, yoga can be enjoyable but must be treated with respect. There probably aren't many people who will be able to devote the necessary time and practise it takes to be like Lisa Schwartz, but with a little self-application they can enjoy many rewarding benefits of yoga.

The following is the "Report of the Appeals Committee in the Case of Professor Marlene Webber." It is the administration version of their justifications for upholding the decision of J.V. Thompson, Director of the School of Social Work not to renew Webber's teaching contract because of her political beliefs. We ask you to read the document and make up your own mind whether the administration was justified in reaching this decision.

Following the report of the Appeals Committee are resolutions in response to the non-renewal of Webber's contract drawn up by "The Ad Hoc Committee of Professors Against Political Firings."

Webber was fired last term allegedly because of her political beliefs, she has recently lost her case in the appeals procedure. She has since distributed a leaflet explaining her impressions of the appeals proceedings.

A number of documents and written submissions were presented by both the appellant and respondent for consideration by the Committee. The entire proceedings were tape recorded by the Secretary and erased at the conclusion of the case.

Nature of the Appeal

The appellant made her appeal against the decision of the Director of the School of Social Work not to recommend the extension of her provisional appointment beyond the initial two-year period. The appellant gave as the basis for the appeal that improper grounds had been used in the evaluation, namely, a consideration of her political activities. In her letter of appeal, dated January 3, 1978, the appellant insisted that the grounds be limited to Section 1 (b) (iii) ("evaluation was made on inadequate or improper grounds") of the Appeals Procedure. She did not claim that the procedures used were unfair. Thus, the Committee had to decide if the grounds on which the decision was based were improper.

General Nature of the Case

Before it could make a decision on the impropriety of the grounds, the Committee had to consider the general nature of the case. The appointment of Professor Webber was clearly a provisional one, so that what was involved was not a breaking of a contract. It was not a dismissal, for dismissal means the termination by the employer of an appointment before the end of the stated contractual period. In order to continue the relationship, the parties would have to enter into a new contract.

The appellant is not a tenured member of the faculty. Therefore, the non-renewal of her contract differs significantly from the case of termination "for cause." In the latter case, the burden of proof on the University is far greater than that required for non-renewal of contract. Indeed, in the former case, the burden is on the employee to prove his/her case.

It is implicit in the Terms and Conditions of Employment for Teachers that a faculty member has the right to learn the reasons for a negative decision and be given a chance to rebut them. However, the Committee accepted that the respondent was not obliged to prove cause for non-renewal.

Procedures Used in the Evaluation

Although the appellant did not question the procedures used by Dr. Thompson in making his decision for a negative recommendation, the Committee noted that a peer review system was used in the School in this case, and that there appeared to be no significant departure from the procedures ordinarily used in the School.

Consideration of the Grounds

The reasons indicated by Dr. Thompson in his letter to Professor Webber dated December 12, 1977, for not renewing the contract were "political activities" both on and off campus. The Committee had to decide if "political activities" constituted improper grounds according to the Terms and Conditions of Employment.

On the matter of political beliefs, the Terms and Conditions are quite explicit. They do not cover political "activities", and it was clear that Dr. Thompson made a distinction between "beliefs" and "activities." The Committee considered it natural that political activity would grow out of political belief, and that one would not reasonably expect non-renewal of contract to be the natural outcome of political activities per se. The academic question presented was whether the political orientation of the appellant had an undue effect on her approach to particular problems in the area of social work. Specifically, Dr. Thompson attempted to show that the political activities of the appellant (1) reflected adversely on the University, and/or School of Social Work, (2) made her and the School incompatible, and (3) interfered with her teaching and professional duties in several ways.

The Committee felt that the witnesses presented by the respondent, Dr. Thompson, indicated a clear concern about the appellant's misuse of her position to influence students unduly, about her usefulness in field placements, about her use of courses in the School of Social Work for political purposes, and about her incompatibility with the school in several areas. The witnesses seemed consistent in describing these concerns.

On the other hand, the appellant did not prove her case to the satisfaction of a majority of the Committee members. In substance, she did not make the case that her political orientation did not unduly affect her approach to particular problems in Social Work and that her usefulness to the School was not limited by her political activities.

The Committee's Decision

The decision of the Committee in this case was not a unanimous one. However, by a majority vote the decision of the Committee is IV (m) (i) of the Appeals Procedure: "That the recommendation should stand."

The concern about the appellant's continuation in the School of Social Work by the Director of the School, by the several tenured faculty members in the School, and by the Vice-President of Professional Schools seemed great enough and the evidence presented seemed adequate to warrant the decision made by the Director. Dr. Thompson's contention that "her usefulness to the School is extremely limited because of the very narrow and imbalanced perspective which infiltrates almost every activity in which she engages" was established as adequate reason to the satisfaction of a majority of the Committee members. The recommendation for non-renewal was therefore deemed appropriate.

An Open Letter from Gaile E. Thompson, Assistant Professor, M.U.N. of Social Work.

I am taking the unusual step of submitting my resignation (effective September 1st, 1978) from the School of Social Work in an open letter to the University Community because my dismissal cannot be separated from the dismissal of Professor Marlene Webber and the public issue involved.

When I joined the Faculty of the School in August, 1977, I did so because I understood from interviews with the Director, Victor Thompson and the Faculty that the School was committed to a flexible education process that would enable students to critically evaluate the society around them and develop skills of practical use to Labrador people in their aspirations for social justice. I accepted

To All Members

The March 30th release of the report of the Appeals Panel announcing their decision on my hearing is yet another round in the campaign of political persecution against myself by the reactionary administration of Memorial University. The Appeals Committee decided by a majority (actually 3-2) to uphold the recommendation of the director of the School of Social Work that my contract not be renewed.

I appealed my firing on the grounds that it had nothing to do with my competence or ability as a professor but was an open and shut case of persecution for my support of the Communist Party of Canada (Marxist-Leninist). Very few people had any faith in the appeals procedure, so this decision to uphold the reactionary stand of the administration that progressive faculty can be fired for their political beliefs is not surprising. The entire hearings were conducted behind closed doors and with an air of secrecy, and the reason is quite clear. From the beginning to the end of the hearings were a complete fraud.* The administration built its entire case not on a shred of any real evidence, but on hysterical anti-communism, lies, half-truths, distortions and slanderous gossip.

After news of my dismissal was made public in December, large numbers of students, faculty and people from the community came to my support in opposing my unjust firing. The administration, seeing itself isolated on this charge, was forced to change its grounds to charging that my teaching was the issue, that I was proselytizing in the classroom. During the course of the hearings I completely disproved these charges. The administration brought forward no evidence to support my director's initial reasons for the firing: "Your political activities have indicated considerable divergence from the philosophy of the School." Your involvement both on and off campus with a political movement which is totally inimical to the system upon which our government is based... (1) Due to the lack of evidence, the Appeals Committee sided with the administration. They concluded that the matter of political beliefs in the Terms and Conditions (of Employment) are quite explicit. They do not cover political activities. In saying, the members of the Committee concur with the administration that the Terms and Conditions of Employment, supposedly set up to protect the members of the Faculty, should instead be interpreted in an arbitrary way to serve the interests of the administration. The appeals procedure is surrounded by a facade of democracy, "peer review", etc. In fact it has been constructed to be "impartial" while in fact it serves as a means of allowing reactionary academics, the out section of upper petit bourgeoisie whose world view is that of the bourgeoisie, to serve the interests of the administration.

The significance of this case is centred on the much-touted guarantee of "academic freedom" and the contention of ideas that do not exist in the universities. People see once more in my case that "freedom" extends only to various trends and schools of bourgeois ideology, including all forms of opportunism. In reality the bourgeoisie exercises brutal dictatorship over every sector of society. The rich want the universities and colleges to be the exclusive preserve of bourgeois ideology.

In making public their conclusions reached behind closed doors the Appeals Committee squirms on the question of political persecution.

s the Dust... Again

position of Assistant Professor with the understanding from the Director that I would be working in the areas of my experience and study which are rural community development and the socio-economic aspects of resource development.

In order to make my teaching in these areas relevant to Newfoundland, it is necessary to be familiar with the concrete socio-economic conditions of the province and the aspirations, views and values of people here. However, the School chose instead to cast me in the role of "instant expert" in community work, thereby placing me in the position of having to teach without the opportunity to acquire the prerequisite grounding in local conditions.

I regard this as a serious academic failing that the School obviously regards advanced university as adequate substitutes for grass-roots experience and field-based knowledge. Furthermore, I was discouraged in my attempt to compensate for this lack by seeking to learn from and cooperate with other Departments and individuals who had experience in the areas where I needed background.

It is also appalling to me that the goal of the School is not to develop an analytical perspective in the students but rather to promote a passive acceptance of the status quo in order to make the students acceptable to a narrow range of government agencies. It has become increasingly apparent in the course of this year that there is little tolerance of diverse perspectives within the School which is based on the explicit assumption of many faculty that the "Nfld. Community" will not tolerate the open exchange of ideas so that people in the School can make their own decisions which ideas most aptly describe the world, which theories assist practice and whose interests the students aspire to serve.

These contradictions came to a head in terms of my work when the School a Director chose not to renew Professor Webber's contract. From the day she received her first verbal communication from Dr. Thompson of the decision, I attempted to listen to all viewpoints with my office door open to all, as did some other faculty who like myself, had not been consulted and who likewise had no understanding of the grounds upon which she was being dismissed.

It soon became apparent that the majority of my colleagues regarded it as a wrong attitude on my part to ask "why she is being dismissed", "On what grounds", "what are the facts" and "what are the implications of this action for the professional goals and ethics we expressly subscribe to?"

Based on my own assessment of the situation it became clear that Professor Webber is a victim of political persecution, a condition which violates the "Terms and Conditions of Employment for ZTeachers" and indeed the code of ethics for members of our profession.

It was with complete disgust that I watched the unprofessional and unconscionable treatment given to Professor Webber by fellow faculty. The majority refused to even say "good-day" to her in the hallway and senior faculty circulated a secret petition against her. The petition was presented to me behind closed doors by two senior faculty, a difficult position for many who are new faculty or awaiting decisions on tenure, and I did not sign it (in conjunction with four other faculty, two untenured and two tenured). To what use this petition was put I have never been told.

In attempting to remain open-minded on the issues and facts before us as faculty within the University I found myself subject to treatment similar to what Professor Webber has experienced: outright lies and disregard of facts, attempted manipulation by faculty because of my association with Professor Webber and finally, almost total avoidance socially and professionally.

I cannot continue to work in this atmosphere of the School in which black is labeled white, where there is no free discussion of the problems that face us as a School and where deception, manipulation and self-interest are the order of the day. I think that Nfld.-Labrador and its University have just reason to expect something better from a professional school that is preparing Newfoundlanders to work with the people and realities of this region.

Gaile P. Noble

they accept the ridiculous distinction between political beliefs and political activities, and without pausing for a breath they acknowledge its absurdity. Then they record their meek assent to the administration's maneuver to shift the ground of their attack away from my political activities and onto the effect of my political beliefs on my teaching, pretending that somehow my teaching can be construed as "political activities" rather than as the expression of my political beliefs. There is the logic of charlatans who can find nothing but semantics to paper over the truth.

The Appeals Committee makes the point that "concern" from "several tenured faculty members in the School, any by the Vice President of Professional Schools seemed great enough and the evidence presented seemed adequate enough to warrant the decision made by the director". The Terms and Conditions of Employment for Teachers are thrown out because Bruneau, Thompson and their like find progressive ideas repugnant, and are "concerned" because these ideas are finding wider and wider acceptance among the students. The Appeals Committee refused to investigate the matter of admitted "indirect government pressure".

A more detailed report of the substance of the hearings, with the evidence and arguments on both sides, will be released by my advisor for the hearings, Dr. Roger Clark, and myself.

From Marlene Webber, School of Social Work April 3, 1978

The Ad Hoc Committee of Professors Against Political Firings reiterates its determined opposition to the firing of faculty members for their political beliefs and activities. In particular we stand opposed to the non-renewal of Professor Webber's contract because of her support for the Communist Party of Canada (Marxist-Leninist). We defend her right to disseminate Marxist-Leninist ideas and to engage in social practice based on these ideas.

We are vigorously opposed to the fact that the "Terms and Conditions of Employment for Teachers" have been arbitrarily interpreted and, in fact, thrown out in the case of Professor Webber's renewal. The Appeals Committee which heard Professor Webber's case concluded that the Terms and Conditions do not protect the political activities of faculty members. We reject the idea that a distinction can be made between political beliefs and activities.

We are firmly opposed to the "oath of confidentiality" imposed on the members of the Appeals Committee, as this has never been agreed to by MUNFA. We urge the members of the Appeals Committee, who are not in agreement with the decision to support non-renewal, to issue a minority report giving their conclusions and the reasons for them.

We have seen from this case that in the context of a closed hearing, faculty rights are not guaranteed adequate protection and we therefore demand that open hearings at the discretion of the appellant be instituted at this University.

*These resolutions were passed by unanimous decision at a meeting of the Ad Hoc Committee of Professors Against Political Firings.

Comment:

by Guy Wright

Marlene Webber has lost her appeal for reversal of the decision of J.V. Thompson, head of the school of Social Work not to renew her contract. The appeals procedure, judging from the skimpy evidence available had all the makings of a classic kangaroo court, certainly unworthy of an institution calling itself a place of higher learning.

The administration seems to feel it had the right to impose an "oath of confidentiality" which was meant presumably to protect the rights of the accused, in this case, Webber. Yet this oath has never been agreed to by the MUN Faculty Association (MUNFA) and Webber declared that she wanted the oath waived in her case so the hearing could be conducted in the open. The administration used the oath to cover up what looks for all the world like an orchestrated procedure.

The appeals committee allegedly tried to determine whether or not Webber's political beliefs conflicted with her role as a teacher and researcher. They decided that they did, however in the report of the committee published elsewhere in this paper they give no accounting of how this decision was reached. All the report really says is that it is satisfied that Webber's case does not seem justified. By the way, this report was supposed to be confidential, hidden from the rest of the university community, but according to the public.

The session was taped, but these tapes were erased immediately after a decision was reached, why? It seems a bit like writing with no ink in the pen.

The whole issue of Webber's firing raises a number of very basic issues of which you should be aware by now. If a professor can be fired for holding political beliefs that do not happen to coincide with those of the administration, a precedent is now set for that prof's removal.

If the university has decided that it will oppose communism in a concrete way, it means that publications from teachers here that may have a leftist bias, as many do, may be censored. If the university censors the material that profs teach and publish it will affect you, not only because your education will suffer because of it, but because the quality of your degree as it is looked upon by others will suffer. The university as a whole will fail to attract good minds because of a repressive administration and the reputation of these hallowed halls will dwindle. It will affect your credibility as a person who has graduated from a repressive institution and it will affect your career.

I am no friend of Marlene Webber's and I think very little of her party the Communist Party of Canada (Marxist-LENINIST) BUT WE CANNOT AFFORD TO LET THE ADMINISTRATION RIALROAD IT'S POLITICS ON US. The issue is much bigger than one professor's firing, we should examine the idea of a university and what freedom of belief should mean in a university situation.

Student Aid Not The "Gear"

by DOUG LETTO

We should be warned in advance. Come September, the chaotic scene at the Student Aid Division on Elizabeth Avenue will spring to life. The queue waiting to question the student aid officers about loans and loan applications, will take days to wear away.

In my three years here at Memorial, I have not seen anything different than the situation described above. Let me explain.

There is a loan application deadline for the fall semester, usually August 1. If your application is received before that date you are 'guaranteed' to have your reply concerning whether or not your application for student assistance has been accepted.

An application received after this date will probably not be processed before the end of September. The number of such 'late' applications is overwhelming, and this is what creates the chaotic situation described above.

For this situation the student blames bureaucratic red-tape, and the Student Aid branch places the blame on tardy students. Both sides can easily substantiate their claims: the student who will have to wait three weeks for a reply, and the student aid officer by slipping a disc as he lifts the late applications for student financial aid.

The situation described above is real. Indeed, it is too real, and that is good reason for it to be stopped.

There are several ways in which the practice of late applications and late replies can be terminated, and at last, made to work for the student who, in the end, is the person who suffers most.

Therefore, I advocate several steps that should be fought for by our Student Union. These are steps that would work very well for all of those who are dependent on the forms of student financial aid.

Firstly, the Student Aid Office should be moved to the MUN campus, preferably to the Thompson Student Centre. Presently, it is located too far away from the people it is designed to serve, and it is very costly to travel back and forth, especially for the person who does not have a motor vehicle at his disposal. That, no doubt, includes the vast majority of the student population.

Secondly, the Registrar's Office should work more closely with the Student Aid Branch. More specifically, the application for financial aid should be attached to the application for University. The Registrar's Office would make it a policy that both applications would have to be mailed in the same envelope. This would also apply for students who do not require student aid. They would merely state on the loan application that they do not request such assistance. Further to this, the Registrar's Office would return any application that is not accompanied by the other.

Thirdly, at peak periods, especially in the summer, the Department of Education should provide money for the Student Aid Branch to hire Memorial students to help alleviate the 'brunt' of the large number of applications received at this time.

If these three steps were followed, the student aid branch would be more accessible to the student, and as a result, it would become a service rather than a drawback as it now is at 85 Elizabeth. Too, a student would not be accepted in the University if there was not included the application for student aid, unless he had indicated that he would not request such aid. Lastly, the whole bureaucratic process could be speeded up, and instead of getting a reply on September 3, one would be informed of his status a couple of weeks earlier.

This plan would not alleviate all the headaches at registration time, but it would help students get quicker and more satisfactory results with regard to their status at this university. This plan is what the students of Memorial must fight for, it is one that we must focus our sights upon. If we don't, fight for this plan, one can only surmise that apathy and laziness have a hold of the reins of Memorial's student population.

Churches Condemn Violence

SAN FRANCISCO (NDS-CUP) — Twenty-six religious leaders — but no Catholics — have co-signed a statement deploring the violence associated with the abortion controversy.

In recent months, numerous abortion clinics across the country have been the target of violent attacks. In one instance, a clinic was fire-bombed while staff and patients were inside. In another, a six-months pregnant woman who was not seeking an abortion was pushed to the floor.

The religious leaders' statement notes that the Judeo-Christian heritage teaches its followers to resolve conflicts by non-violent means. And it calls on all Americans to refrain from violence and unlawfulness in any form.

Every Catholic bishop in the country was asked to sign the statement, but none would participate.

Student aid changes

OTTAWA (CUP) — Despite vocal opposition from student organizations and predictions to the contrary, the federal government has gone ahead with legislation that increases the amount of money students will be forced to borrow before they receive grants.

Bill C-37, an Act to Amend the Canada Student Loans Act, was introduced March 22, indicating the government has decided to proceed with controversial changes which the National Union of Students and provincial and regional student organizations have criticized as regressive.

While the bill will assess students' needs on a weekly rather than yearly basis — a welcomed amendment—an increase in the maximum amount borrowable to $70 per week will place the burden of inflation on students. Since the last loan ceiling increase in 1975, provincial governments, which fund the grant portion of students aid, have had to absorb increases in the assessment of education costs.

The loan ceiling increase restores loans as roughly two-thirds of the amount awarded under aid programs.

Despite increases in the amount a student must borrow each year, the bill does not change the lifetime maximum borrowable figure — $9,800 — which has remained unchanged through the last few ceiling increases.

Aid programs until the mid-1970s assumed seven years of study in calculating the lifetime maximum. If that principle were retained with the proposed changes, a needy student in a professional faculty could be expected to have to borrow as much as $20,000 to complete her or his education.

NUS suggests this relationship hasn't been kept up because this is an "outrageous figure. Even the most anti-student politician would have to say something," says NUS executive-secretary Dan O'Connor.

"If the seven year rule of thumb were maintained the madness of what the government is doing in student loans would become clear. They don't dare show their hand and bring together their changes with the principles of the aid programs established in the 1960s."

The new bill also proposes giving much greater powers to aid officials in the areas of conditions for receiving and repaying loans. If approved, this would permit the government to make changes without "going public."

There are some positive measures in the bill, such as a proposal to drop a clause requiring "satisfactory scholastic standing" before students could become eligible for loans. While the requirement has been ignored in practice for some time, the change reflects opposition to a trend in some provinces — such as Alberta and Nova Scotia — to use the loan system as a back-door academic standard.

O'Connor says this is "inequitable since it applies only to students who can't afford to pay the costs of their education themselves."

Student organizations were predicting the government might not go ahead with the amendments because opposition debate would take up parliamentary time, which is scarce before an upcoming election, for a measure not considered a priority for the federal government.

But many provinces have proceeded with changes in their aid plans which are conditional on the approval of the federal loan changes. The announcement by the most recent province, Newfoundland, has provoked strong opposition among students.

The secretary of state—the minister responsible for student loans—had hoped to push the legislation through without major debate, and had gone so far as to issue an information brief which claimed that student organizations approved of all the changes.

The March 2 leaked brief was in fact the first notice the associations had received of the loan increase. Ministry officials back-pedalled when the organizations made their opposition known to opposition politicians. The officials claimed that, despite a long-standing condemnation of loan changes by student organizations, the secretary was justified in assuming student approval "because they had never voiced their disagreement with this specific change."

The secretary of state was also caught trying to change the record of parliamentary debate in Hansard when he mistakenly told Parliament March 16 that the new legislation would include provisions which would not require graduating students to start repaying loans until they had found a job. The existing loan act requires students to start repaying six months after graduation, and Bill C-37 does nothing to change that.

The National Union of Students is now drafting its own proposal for the loans bill which it says will not increase student indebtedness. The organization is also pressing the government to introduce emergency grants legislation.
