

MUN faculty keen on forming union

by KARL MOORES
and GERRY PORTER

Memorial University's faculty may embark on a unionizing drive this fall.

At the April general meeting of the faculty association, a committee was set up to study the possibility of the association's certification under the Labour Relations Act.

"The MUNFA Certification Committee was overwhelmingly approved with only four or five dissenting votes," said committee chair Greg Kealey, a history professor.

He said he was "quietly optimistic" about the chances of the certification drive's success.

The committee will prepare a statement of objectives for faculty certification and will present information about certification to MUNFA members.

It will also develop a strategy to gain members' support for certification.

In the fall there will be a canvassing of faculty," said Kealey.

The committee will then advise the MUNFA executive on how popular the idea is among faculty.

Said Kealey, if the response is favorable, "then we'll start signing cards."

"To date, our experience in talking to people is very positive," he said.

While an attempt at unionization was unsuccessful in 1979, conditions have changed since then, said MUNFA president Mark Graesser of the Political Science department.

"Two thirds of university faculties in Canada now have certified union," he said.

"It seems to be the trend."

"University professors are self directed, self motivated and hard working individuals," said Graesser. "The university is facing a critical situation regarding the salary of faculty. It affecting morale and all this at a time when enrolment is going up."

"Individual faculty members are teaching up to twice as many students as they had been," he said.

MUNFA submits an annual brief to the administration president where salary requests are detailed.

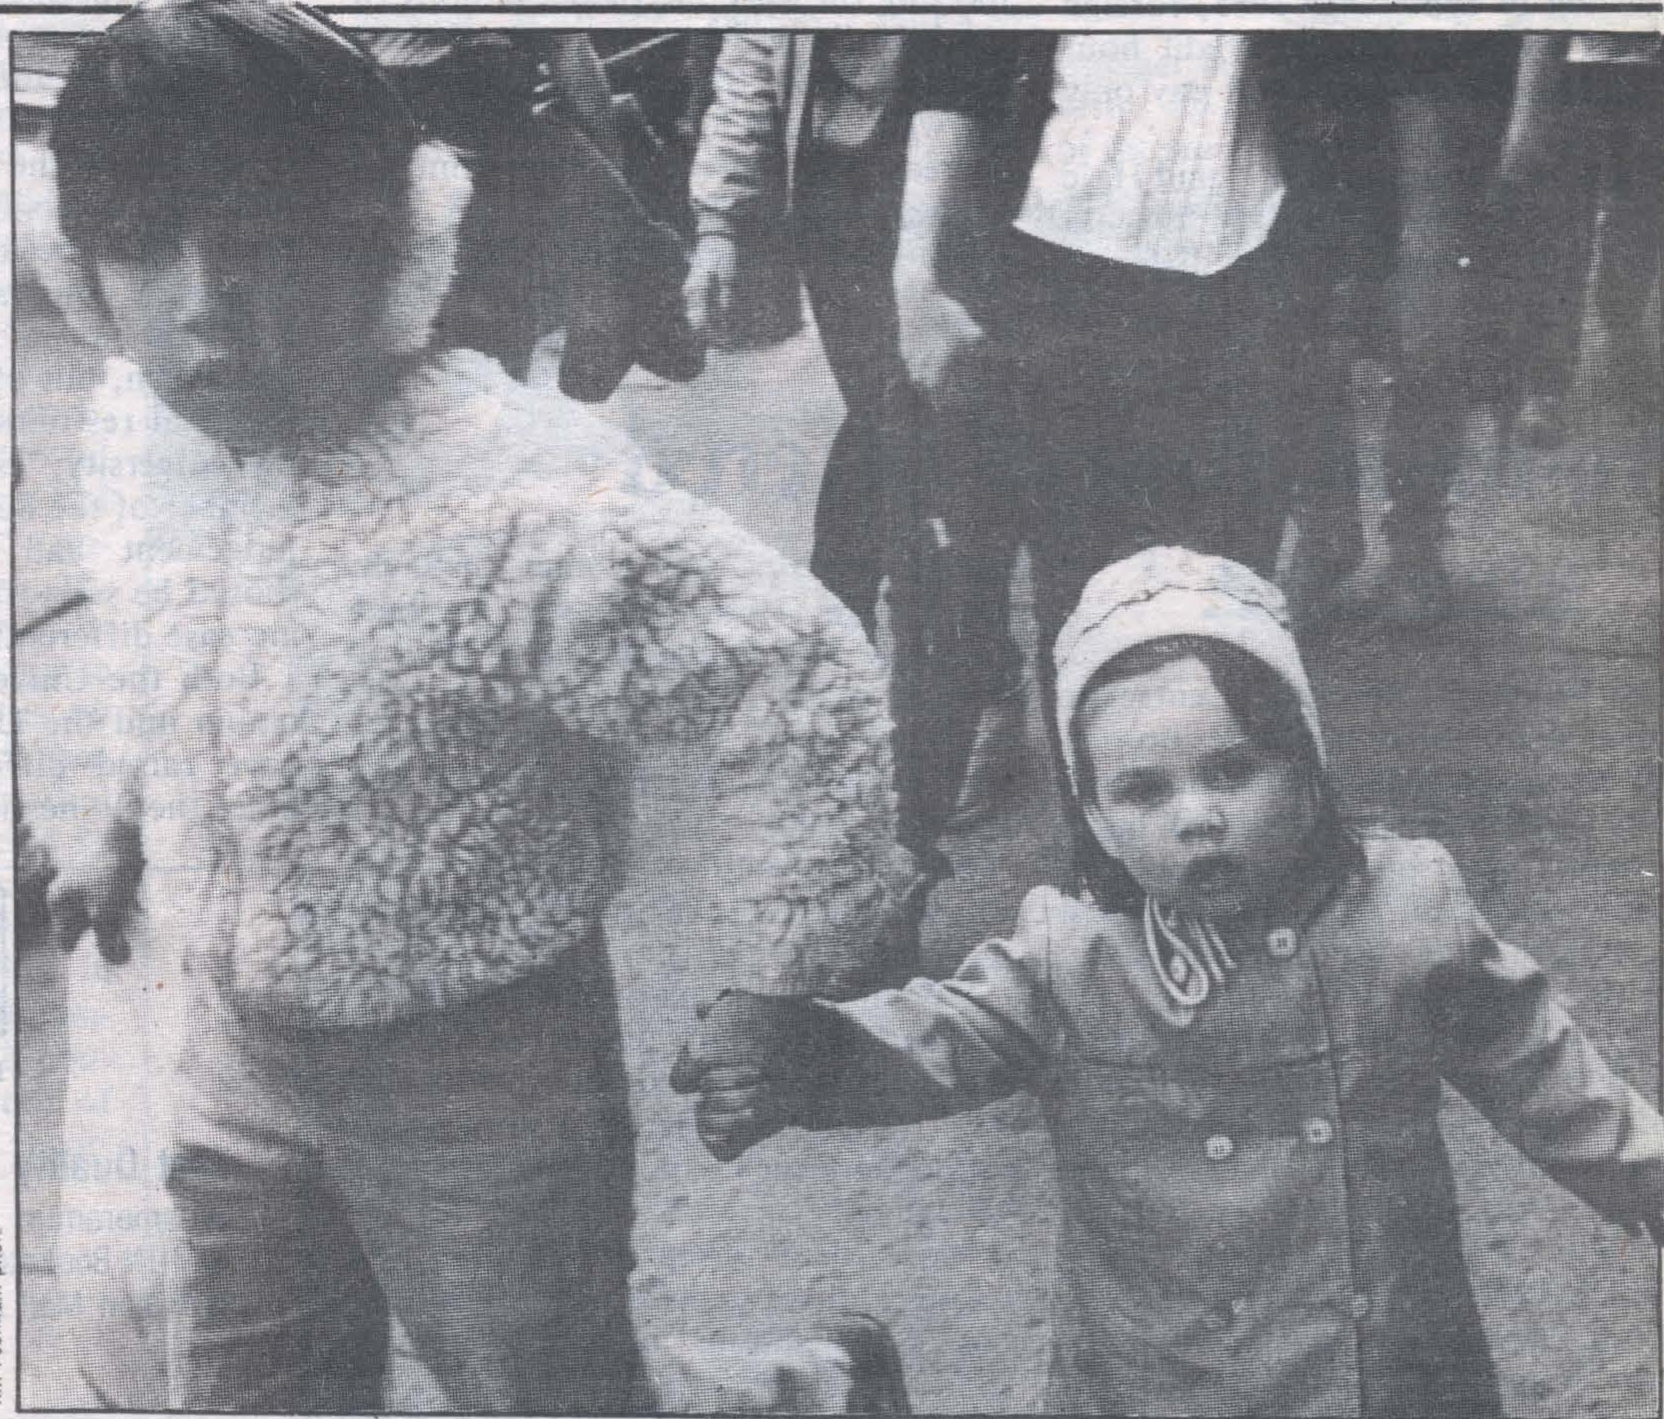

"This year's brief documented that Memorial's salaries are the lowest in Canada, barring a few small institutions. Our conclusion was that in order for MUN faculty to regain their 1980 salaries relative to inflation, they would require a 17 per cent increase," said Graesser.

The administration responded with a $750 bonus for each faculty member.

Graesser said MUN has been unable to get more funding from the government, and since the university depends almost entirely on the government for funding, it would be difficult to obtain more money from within the university.

"Our primary responsibility is to work within the framework of the university," he said.

But, "we can talk to the appropriate politicians."

High enrolment causing problems

Higher enrolment for the spring semester has caused problems in some departments of the university.

Enrolment rose about 19 per cent this spring and some departments did not have the resources to accommodate the unexpected number of students.

Peter Boswell, Political Science head, says only one professor is teaching in that department.

"Traditionally, we have two people in the spring, but we were deluged with students in the fall and winter semesters and had to offer more sections (then)," Boswell said.

The extra courses in the fall and winter semesters meant the department could not afford to hire more than one professor for the summer. Boswell said he had been negotiating with several sessional instructors to teach a course each, but did not receive approval in time to hire them.

Peter Sinclair, Sociology head, said his department's course offerings were fairly crowded this spring. Several of the third and fourth year courses were filled in pre-registration.

The cramped situation at MUN this semester has even come to the attention of local politicians, such as Peter Fenwick, New Democratic Party leader in the province.

"This third semester is one of the worst semesters for Memorial University in years," Fenwick said.

Fenwick attributes MUN's inability to accommodate the increased number of students to financial restraint.

"It's up to the university and the provincial government to devise new methods of stretching our education dollars, and if necessary, more funds will have to be found," Fenwick said.

Canadian scientists organize against Star wars plan

OTTAWA (CUP) — Large numbers of Canadian scientists are refusing to work in military research programs connected to the United States Star Wars plan to arm outer space.

"(We decided) we didn't want any part of it," said McMaster University chemistry professor Adam Hitchcock. "(We want) to express our abhorrence of the program."

Hitchcock organized a petition at McMaster which was signed by 605 staff and graduate students, including university president Alvin Lee. "That's one-third of the engineers and scientists at McMaster. That's pretty good considering we only circulated it for three days."

The petition said the Star Wars would escalate the arms race, and violate the 1972 Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty. Hitchcock said the McMaster scientists pledged non-cooperation with the research involved.

An earlier petition at the University of Toronto garnered 40 signatures from U of T scientists, who said the star wars plan was too complex and would not work. A third petition at the University of British Columbia gathered 749 signatures, including faculty from UBC, the U of T, the University of Waterloo, McGill and the Universite de Quebec a Montreal.

The scientists on the third petition asked Canada not to join in research for the program and warned they would not co-operate if Canada does. The petition also said the U.S. space weapons initiative would be destabilizing and that it would start a new arms race.

A Globe and Mail report on March 29 revealed Canada is already involved in Star Wars research as work on high energy lasers is underway at the U of T's Institute of Aerospace Studies.

Simon Fraser hikes foreign student fees

VANCOUVER (CUP) — The Board of Governors at Simon Fraser University has approved a proposal to raise foreign students' tuition fees to twice that of domestic fees.

Starting in September 1985, foreign students will pay $86 per credit hour while Canadian students will pay only $43.

"I am very disappointed," said Haje Protais, president of SFU's International Club. "As long as the differential exists, this university will be practicing discrimination in a country that prides itself on equality and democracy."

For other observers at the packed meeting on May 27, their opinions of the board's decision were mixed. In a surprise move, SFU President William Saywell amended his motion to decrease the tuition fee hike from 2.5 to the 2.0 passed by the board.

Another amendment to allow students from 25 underdeveloped countries to be exempt from the differential fees was referred to another committee.

Said student society representative Michael Hoechsmann: "At best it is a bittersweet victory. We were aiming for complete abolition of differential fees and that is still our goal."

Several of the board members said that the university was forced to raise tuition fees because of cutbacks and budgetary constraints.

"It is not a matter of pride or patriotism, but of dealing with serious financial restraints that are placed on the university," said Greg Basham, a member of the board. "I believe it is a judgement call and the president should be supported in his decision to increase differential fees."

Both the University of British Columbia and the University of Victoria have raised differential fees to 2.5 times the domestic rate.

Pre-natal course offered

by JACQUI HOWSE

The Women's Resource Centre on campus will be offering classes on pre-natal care, says the Centre's director.

Elsa Burt hopes the classes will begin by August, and that the program will be fully operational by August when the majority of the student body returns for classes.

"It's not going to cost anything," says Burt. A public health nurse will conduct the classes in the Women's Centre, on the ground floor of the Thomson Student Centre in 1001-D, next to the Vault. "(The nurse) is fantastic," says Burt. "She really wants to do these classes."

Burt hopes to be able to offer a variety of services to women through the Centre. "Last semester we had meetings for single mothers, and it worked really well. A lot of women came to them. We even got women who weren't single mothers, but felt like they were."

A meeting will be called for women who are interested in attending the pre-natal care classes.

"We'll have a general meeting in the Centre," says Burt, "and (we'll) just ask them, 'what needs do you have?' And if they feel there's a need for a support group, I would be glad to help with that."

More details regarding both the classes and the general meeting will be posted on campus bulletin boards as soon as they become available.

Kelly set to guide CHMR into FM airwaves

by KARL MOORES

The CSU has hired Terry Kelly as the new full-time station manager of CHMR. Kelly, a student radio veteran, has held the voluntary position of station manager for the past two years, but in February the CSU decided to give the station a more responsible appearance by hiring a full-time manager.

"The hiring of a full-time station manager will help CHMR achieve its three phase goal of becoming a credible FM station with decent production facilities," said Kelly shortly after assuming his position.

According to Kelly the station's future looks bright, with application for an FM transmitter as well as the development of new training programs to up-grade news, operation, and production techniques at the station.

Of primary importance is the completion of a three phase modernization plan for CHMR. With last semester's installation of a new control room and distribution amplifiers that are compatible with stereo broadcasting, phase I has been all but completed. Phase II will end when CHMR begins broadcasting to much of the city in FM stereo. Next week members of CHMR's board of directors will begin the long and tedious process of making application to the Canadian Radio & Television Commission (CRTC) for an FM broadcast licence. If the application is successful CHMR will purchase an FM stereo transmitter and approach the University administration through the Dean of Students, for permission to locate transmitter facilities on campus. CHMR would then appear on the FM dial somewhere between 88 and 92 and, on the basis of a 1975 census, would be received by about 12,000 households in the vicinity of the MUN campus. The final phase will consist of the purchase of state of the art production and recording facilities.

"This three step process should be completed within two to three years," said Kelly.

The computerization of CHMR's record library is also on Kelly's agenda. With the help of Randy Dodge of Computer Services, the station should soon begin the task of cataloguing records. "This would enable programmers to check holdings through cross-references such as the song or album title or the artist's name, and all at the touch of a button," said Kelly.

The new station manager is also concerned with upgrading the training of the station's staff. Longer and better quality news writing seminars are planned as well as a more formalized system of board classes and testing. "While no programs presently exist for training in production techniques, they should be available in the not-too-distant future," Kelly said.

THE SENTINEL. New MUN Radio station manager Terry Kelly guards CHMR door on third floor of TSC against dangerous intruders who might have good taste in music.

Provincial students' federation has everything except money, office

by BETH RYAN

The Newfoundland and Labrador Federation of Students seems to have everything going for it — potential, membership, direction. Everything except an office and money.

Before NLFS was founded in February 1985, there was no provincial organization for post secondary institutions, said David Chaffey, Western Region representative.

Now NLFS represents 16 post secondary institutions across the province including Memorial University, College of Trades, College of Fisheries, Sir Wilfred Grenfell College, two community colleges and a number of district vocational schools. One of the nursing schools has shown interest in joining NLFS and future plans include recruiting new members from the various business, technical and computer colleges.

One of NLFS's current concerns is limited finances. They have yet to collect membership fees because individual institutions have to elect new councils and hold referenda. As fees will not come into effect until September 1986, NLFS is without a permanent source of income. The organization is presently operating on a government grant, offered in connection with the International Year of Youth.

NLFS also lacks office space to run the organization out of and are working of MUN Student Union vice president communications John Reid's office. Reid is the National Executive representative and acts as a liaison between the Canadian Federation of Students and NLFS.

"CFS was very helpful in getting us set up," said Cyril Mullins, a spokesperson.

President Beth Walsh said NLFS is striving for autonomy for all student councils at post secondary institutions. Most student councils have faculty advisors who often control the students' funds and activities.

Walsh said the group will be approaching the office of the minister of Career Development and Advanced Studies to define their position on student government and organizations.

The executive held a meeting in St. John's last week to discuss their plans and the next general meeting is scheduled for November 1985.

Academics urged to boycott MUN

by IAN CARTER

The Canadian Association of University Teachers is advising academics to consider alternatives to Memorial University for the next Learned Societies conference, scheduled here for 1988.

Memorial is presently under censure by CAUT because of the university's refusal to renew the contract of social worker professor Marlene Webber. The reasons the administration gave for their refusal in 1978 were her professed Marxist-Leninist leanings and alleged misuse of her classroom.

A CAUT committee of inquiry was set up to look into the university's handling of the case. The committee found that then administration president Moses Morgan and the Board of Regents had committed a serious breach of academic freedom in basing the non-renewal of Webber's contract on her political activities without producing "admissible and cogent evidence" that the activities constituted professional wrong doing.

The committee also found in its investigation of the case that Webber, had, in fact, alerted her students to her political perspective in the classroom.

To date all CAUT and local faculty association attempts to negotiate a settlement for Professor Webber, including an offer to arbitrate the differences, have failed to resolve the case.

CAUT maintains that a censored university suffers because professors seeking employment will avoid universities under censure.

But Mark Graesser, president of the MUN Faculty Association said censure has had little effect on the university.

"I don't know of any specific examples where professors seeking employment have turned down a job offer because the university was censored," he said.

"The situation is deadlocked and has been for some time because neither side is willing to change their position."

CAUT wants an outside negotiator to participate in resolving the dispute, however administration president Leslie Harris has refused, saying it is an internal matter.

Graesser said MUNFA hopes that the situation will be resolved soon, noting that the date for the learned societies conference is three years in the future.

Get organized

For the first time in Memorial University's history, faculty members seem inclined to take the big leap to forming a union.

The faculty association (MUNFA) has formed a committee to work over the summer on the question and if the response looks encouraging, a signing drive could begin before the year is out. According to committee chairperson Greg Kealey, there is substantial support for certification among the faculty.

Given the developments of the past few years, this sentiment is hardly surprising, but the fact that it was only 1979 when the last unionizing attempt failed indicates how faculty's attitudes have changed under the iron-fisted policies of the provincial government.

Faculty salaries (which are supposed to be set by the Board of Regents) have been frozen for several years by the government. And on top of that, enrolment increases combined with funding cutbacks have doubled class sizes and increased the workload for many profs.

Whether a unionized faculty can affect any change from a government that has already displayed its absolute intransigence against organized labour is difficult to say, but such an effort would certainly strengthen their position.

G.P.

You don't say

While most government agencies are notoriously quiet in their celebration of 1985 as International Year of Youth, the provincial department of the environment is doing its part. In a press release received from that department, minister John Butt announced that it was his pleasure that there are "complimentary garbage bags available for schools and organized youth groups in the province for clean-up projects."

Butt goes on to say: "The United Nations has proclaimed that 1985 shall be the International Year of Youth, and my department would like to help celebrate this special event while promoting environmental awareness among our young people."

Butt declined to give suggestions as to where the garbage may be dumped.

Unemployment and students

Every summer students have the greatest difficulty finding jobs. Those who do find work rarely get more than the minimum wage. Even college graduates who were once reasonably assured of finding work in their respective fields are joining the unemployment lines in record numbers.

Why are those under twenty-five the largest single group of unemployed? What, if anything can be done about it?

To a certain extent technology is responsible because more and more industries are able to replace people with machinery. Perhaps the greatest employer is the computer because not only can it do the work of people faster and cheaper but it can also operate machinery in staggering numbers with mind boggling efficiency.

For example, to operate today's telephone service manually with what technology was available in 1900 would take about half the population of North America. In essence what has been happening is that there are increasing numbers of people looking for less and less jobs.

The root of the problem can be traced to the monetary policies of most governments in the Western world. The Canadian budget has been operating on a deficit for a long time. As governments borrow more and more to meet their obligations the demand for money increases. This is one of the main reasons that current interest rates for most loans and mortgages are in the area of 15%.

Any businessperson today considering a commercial venture has to pay 15% or so on the money they borrow to start a business. Or if they have the money to invest they have to forego the interest they would be paid in order to put it into an enterprise.

What this essentially means is that the business has to make a 15% profit in order to just break even. Not all enterprises can do this especially in the first few years of their existence. A person with capital to invest in most cases is a lot better off buying bonds with his money because he has a guaranteed return without the headaches and risks of being in business.

When people with money to invest realize that they are better off buying government bonds than being in business it's easy to understand why there is so much unemployment.

The economic climate in Canada and particularly Newfoundland is not conducive to high rates of employment. The people who can least afford to be taxed are taxed the highest. Large corporations who could and should be paying their share are not in many cases.

In order for any of this to change, small businesses have to be given more subsidie and tax breaks. Businesses who need to hire employees should be given incentives like in Prince Edward Island where the government pays part of employees wages. More low interest loans would help stimulate jobs as well. Moves such as these would help get things started with proper management part-time and summer work could become full-time.

Here is the brief mention of lasagna that was alluded to in the radio ad. Now aren't you glad you read the staffbox. Now here are the people who worked on this issue: Tim Peckham, Gerry Porter, Beth Ryan, Karl Moores, John Gushue, Lisa Porter, Ian Carter, Meredith Hall, Geoff Frampton, Paul Hewson, and Jacqui Howse. And then of course, there's Maggie Keiley, who didn't work on the paper but is another fine example of how working on the Muse can launch you into a very lucrative career.

Very telling...

It's very telling that the same issue of the Muse bemoaning a serious lack of funds for salaries, housing, and staff also features articles spotlighting the Breezeway Annex and the Sports Complex. It's criminal to be begging for money to finance the frivolities when education itself is in such dire straits. Egos and election promises aside, we should remember why we're here in the first place.

MARJORIE COHEN

talks about the budget, free trade, the Tories and jobs, jobs, jobs.

by GERRY PORTER

Marjorie Cohen can't be an economist. When she talks about economics, she doesn't use the language of numbers and statistics, but describes economic policy in terms of the people who have to endure it. When she talks about unemployment, there is no grim-but-sage nod towards the "difficulty" of the problem; instead, there is a call for the "political commitment" to create jobs.

But Marjorie Cohen is an economist, and a well respected one. An author and professor at York University in Toronto, she is frequently called on to participate in economic forums and was even asked by the government to watch the budget speech in the federal finance offices in Toronto with a roomful of bankers ("I was the only one there not in a fancy suit and who didn't have a chauffeur waiting for me.") She was in St. John's last week to participate in a forum on unemployment sponsored by the Coalition for Equality.

The interview begins with a discussion of the recent federal budget, which was the focus of her talk at the unemployment forum. Cohen is quick to refute the government's claim that the budget "is about jobs."

"I think this budget in that respect is a complete disaster. I don't see any way it can create jobs, and neither does (finance minister Michael) Wilson."

She gives numerous examples: 30,000 fewer jobs in the public service than what it would be by 1990; $2 billion cut in transfer payments to the provinces; the increased sales tax—all measures that will increase unemploythese jobs; when you don't have daycare, women will have to do these jobs."

Poor people are going to suffer because of the increased sales tax, she says. "Sales taxes are known to be an incredibly regressive way to collect taxes. This is going to affect poor people because they spend a larger proportion of their income on consumables."

Cohen thinks the most controversial measure in the budget - the partial de-indexation of pensions - will eventually be withdrawn. "I think they're going to have to come down on that. They'll probably wait a year or two and then remove it. And then they're going to say 'gee, isn't this great? We really do listen to the people.'"

And, of course, the half million dollar capital gains tax exemption will do nothing for the unemployed or the poor. She says the bankers she watched the budget with were all quite delighted, naturally, at that measure.

"But these men were delighted not because it was going to be good for their business, but personally, they were ultimately going to get a half million dollars."

"It's a real windfall and it will do absolutely nothing for jobs." What it will do, she says, is encourage speculation. People are likely to take their money out of certain kinds of investments and put it into real estate, where they will make a lot of money and then get out.

Shortly after the budget, Michael Wilson stood up in front of a group of economists and told them that the problem with Canada was that it didn't have enough rich people. That is about as accurate an indicator of the government's economic direction as you can get: they want to create more rich people.

Giving Wilson the benefit of the doubt, Cohen suggests he meant that since there were so few rich people in Canada, he was forced to tax the poor. Ultimately, though, it amounts to a defense of the "trickle down" recently in vogue in the United States. The idea is that if there are lots of rich people, their wealth will eventually trickle down to the poor.

"Galbraith has this lovely notion of the trickle down theory. He said it is like trying to feed the birds oats by giving it to the horse first. There's just a few droppings left along the road. And that's what the effect (of this budget) will be. Nothing: we'll get droppings."

Canada, says Cohen, is moving decidedly to the right in its economic ment or reduce the incomes of the most disadvantaged segments of society.

She is particularly concerned about the effect of the budget on women.

"The cut in transfer payments to the provinces is going to have a big impact in the area of jobs in health and education, and three-quarters of the increase in women's jobs over the past few years has been in three areas: public administration, health and education."

Not only are women going to lose jobs, she says, they are going to lose valuable services in these cuts. "And women are going to have to pick up the slack. When you don't have nursing homes, women will have to do policy, paralleling the measures taken by the Reagan administration when it came to power in 1980.

"I think they are targetting the same kind of thing (as in the US); they are targetting public expenditures on social welfare."

But ironically, at the same time, the US appears to be moving in a slightly different direction.

"If you see what Reagan is proposing in the United States now with regard to taxes, it's really quite interesting, and it's very different from what's going on in Canada. Reagan is actually trying to reduce taxes on ordinary people. He would like to get rid of corporate taxes altogether of course, but he's not going to do that."

So why is Canada moving in this direction?

"I think the dynamics of the politics are somewhat different here because (the Tories) have such a huge majority. They can do whatever they bloody well want."

And what about Brian Mulroney?

"His notion is clear. He's going to make things really attractive for the business sector. After all, this is where he came from. He's very comfortable with the role of being a branch plant manager for the United States."

"So I think we're going to see more of his notion of this global American economy being entrenched in Canada."

Mulroney is likely to get support from the Trudeau-appointed MacDonald Commission on the economy, which is publicly entertaining the idea of free trade with the US as the cure for Canada's ills.

Such a move, says Cohen, would make an already bad economic structure in Canada even worse.

Much of Canada's manufacturing sector is owned by American companies to service the Canadian market. Canadians concentrate mostly on resource extraction for export.

"I don't see any reason why we have to have unemployment."

Without tariff barriers, the American companies have no reason to stay in Canada.

Free trade will also really hurt industries that employ predominantly women.

"All the apparel industries, and the boot and shoe industry, have been targetted as inefficient and the government doesn't care if they go."

"The women who go into these industries tend to be immigrants and they tend to be poor. They're miserable industries to work in; the wages are poor, the conditions are dreadful. But these women don't have any other jobs. And when these jobs go, it'll just be a disaster."

The proponents of free trade, says Cohen, believe that people who favour protection are essentially shirkers: "Here we are. We're not very good. Our productivity is low and we hide behind protection." With free trade Canadians will really have to compete - the strong will flourish and the weak will go out of business.

"It's based on the kind of economic theories you learn when you go to take economics and are so discouraging."

It would also seriously restrict Canada's development options. Since that unemployment is our most serious problem, you look at things very differently than if you say we don't have enough wealthy people."

Cohen's solution is one likely to strike dread in the hearts of the Mulroneyites: "We have to have a plan - an industrial plan. A plan which integrates our resource extracting sector with our manufacturing sector."

"We have fantastic resources. Why are we in such a mess? It's not rational and it doesn't make sense. But we're locked into this crazy economy where the only options seem to be bigger deficits or reducing the deficit on the backs of the poor. And just letting the big multinationals do what they like."

Cohen says an economic plan that worked would have to involve enormous structures, among which would be nationalizing the banks.

"I don't think this government is insincere in what it thinks it is trying to do. I think it genuinely believes that if you let American corporations run the world then everything will be better. But there is a real lack of understanding about what happens to poor people and what it's like to be unemployed for a generation."

But the government does seem to understand what it's like not to have that extra half million dollars you wanted so much. Perhaps, suggests Cohen, you'll hire the woman who lost her job at the textile plant as a housekeeper.

Women's Centre has plans

by BETH RYAN

Elsa Burt has returned from an organizational retreat in Ontario with some new ideas for the Women's Resource Centre.

Burt, the WRC coordinator, said the retreat was held at Carleton University and sponsored by the Secretary of State's Women's Program. While at Carleton, Burt had the opportunity to visit their Women's Centre and talk with the coordinators.

"We have many activities planned for the summer and I'm also involved with several committees," Burt said.

The WRC will be preparing a brief on female youth unemployment for the Royal Commission on Employment and Unemployment. Burt said the centre also hopes to give a single mother eight weeks employment this summer. Through a government funded project, the centre plans to hire a woman to do public relations work for the WRC.

Burt is also involved with student daycare and is working with Ellen MacDonald, from the Students Older Than Average association, on a questionnaire about the accessibility of daycare for students.

The centre is involved with MediaWatch, a national women's organization that aims to improve the image of women in the media. Burt also sits on a committee dealing with sexual harassment at Memorial.

Burt hopes to make some changes within the centre itself such as developing a structure or constitution for the Centre and designing a brochure and posters to promote the WRC on campus. Burt said an ad hoc committee will be formed to study the feasibility of running the women's centre as a cooperative to ensure continuity in the centre.

The centre will be open 9-5 daily during the summer semester and Burt urges women and men to drop by the centre or call 737-4366 if they would like to talk.

Ed. faculty hurt by low salaries

by KARL MOORES

MUN's Dean of Education B.V. Paddock says that low faculty salaries are having an effect on the Education faculty's ability to attract new teaching staff.

"We have had several people this year and other years who have turned down appointments here due to salary," he said. "This restricts the pool of prospective employees to which we have access."

Paddock referred to a faculty member who left a position at MUN recently in order to accept a position elsewhere. "The other position was several thousand dollars higher in salary," he said.

Paddock said the faculty is offering a lot of course sections but faculty are overworked. He said there are still problems of insufficient sections.

This problem has grown more acute due to the 60 per cent increase in Education enrolment since 1979. "We will try to make as many appointments as we can, and we will attempt to staff as many course sections as possible through special contracts, but in some cases we might not be able to offer a sufficient number of course sections to meet student demand."

"We have been forced to limit admission to Masters programs to some applicants," he said.

When asked how the Education faculty rates among other faculties of education in other universities Paddock said, "Our programs still compare favourably. However future comparisons will be a function of the severity of problems here compared to the severity of problems encountered by other faculties of education elsewhere in Canada."

Council set for frolic at Quidi Vidi

by BETH RYAN

The Council of the Students' Union is hoping to improve its image locally by helping the city with its preparations for St. John's Day and Canada Day celebrations, said president Dan Crummell at this week's council meeting.

The CSU will provide indoor facilities for the Canada Day celebrations and will set up a stage and sound system in advance to prepare for poor weather.

For the St. John's Day celebrations, the CSU will sponsor a picnic at Quidi Vidi Lake and will provide food and drink and activities for children.

Crummell said that participating in these events will "give the CSU a good name in the community".

The plans for the Breezeway renovations are well underway and a contract has been negotiated, said Dan Crummell.

Crummell said he sent a proposal to the Dean of Student Affairs, Wayne Ludlow about the Breezeway. Ludlow accepted it with a "friendly amendment" attached that requires the Breezeway to adhere to all Newfoundland Liquor Board and university regulations.

The sports complex is still a top priority of the CSU and Crummell said that the Memorial Alumni Association has expressed some interest in the project.

"The executive has shown full support despite some minor objections," said Crummell.

Alumni executive members Bob Benson and John Gardner plan to meet with the council in the near future.

"I'd like to see the alumni association raise funds on a corporate level," Crummell said.

The CSU will also organize a sports complex committee which will include Crummell, vice president executive Gerry Goulding, VP communications John Reid and councillors Karen Winters and Paul Smith.

Gerry Goulding, VP executive, said that the CSU has booked a Canadian band to play at MUN in the next few weeks. Peter Mann and the Lonely will perform in the Breezeway and in the TSC from Tuesday to Saturday, June 18-22.

Music bldg. sound investment

by BETH RYAN

The Music School presently under construction on the south-east side of the campus will be one of the finest facilities in Eastern Canada and the United States, says a university spokesperson.

Aiden Kiernan, associate director of University Works says, "from the acoustic point of view, this Music School is the best we've seen in Canada and the States."

The $5 million building includes a band rehearsal room, a choral rehearsal room, a 300-seat recital hall and a music library as well as two large classrooms, offices and practice rooms. These new facilities will free the Little Theatre and part of Library Audio Resource Centre which were previously used to hold rehearsals and store the school's record library.

Kiernan said the building features sloped ceilings and 14 inch thick angled walls to ensure good acoustics and sound proof facilities.

The temporary building, which has housed the Music School since 1976, will be torn down once the faculty and students have moved into the new building.

Donald Cook, head of the Music School, is pleased to move out of the grossly inadequate temporary building and into the new facilities. "Quite frankly, the temporary building is a fire hazard," Cook said.

Kiernan said that once the temporary building is removed, there is a possibility that the Arts and Administration Building could be extended.

The Music Building has a capacity of 150 students and Cook said there will approximately be 80 students using the facilities this fall as well as 11 full time faculty and 4 to 5 part time instructors.

Funding for the $5 million building will come from government, the administration, private contributions and fund raising events.

Cook said the Music School is conducting a seat sale in the hopes of raising $120,000 towards the cost of the building. Individuals or groups make a $400 donation to the School in tribute to a relative, friend, musician, or teacher and will be acknowledged by a plaque in the recital hall.

CODCO, again.

After nine years of solo projects, five founding members revive anarcho/comedy troupe's greatest hits

by JOHN GUSHUE

FOUR FIFTHS OF THE CODCO Collective sit huddled around a black and white video monitor, soaking in tapes of decade-old performances. Some of the tapes are of unknown origin — no one is really sure when they were shot, or where they've been since then, but, despite their jagged, rough-edged appearance, they're quite funny. You wouldn't say this if your humour guage was the reserved reaction of the audience: Greg Malone sits oblivious to the skit, while Tommy Sexton, Andy Jones and Mary Walsh just sit, and watch. The fifth, Cathy Jones, putters about the rehearsal room in the MUN Extension Building on Bond Street before joining the others. She too is quiet.

It's been almost nine years since the Codco troupe as a whole performed their last show in St. John's. A generation has grown up since then, and theatre scene has matured into one of the most lively and innovative in the country. Codco can take a good round of applause for that; besides having invented the modern genre of Newfoundland comedy, they also established a theatrical community in a city accustomed only to stuffy imports from Canada and England and haphazard local productions with little merit and less originality. And now five of the original seven are watching themselves on television, preparing for a revival to begin the LSPU Hall next week, all sitting quietly. Aside from the occasional outburst or smile, such as Walsh's giggle following her appearance in the show as a peppy, zesty housewife trying to advertise Campbell's Cream of Mushroom soup without throwing up. You just had to have been there . . .

"Just having to have been there" is one of the things that brought the Codco Five back together again. "A lot of young people have never seen a Codco show," says Andy Jones, the others adding enthused statements in agreement. "As well," Greg explains, "there are a lot of people who want to re-see Codco." There are, of course, many other reasons, ranging from Tommy's "the unemployment ran out" to Andy's observation that the show is "just an experiment, to see where it would go."

The idea of the show has apparently been kicked around for years, but the group hasn't been able to bring everything together to mount the entire production. "We've been wanting to do it for years," Greg explains, "but we haven't had the chance."

Says Tommy: "Everyone's schedules could never really jive because everybody had so many different things on the go and this is the first chance we've all had that we're free for a month."

And so the time has come — again. Codco never really formed at once — Tommy was in Toronto and did a show with Dyan Olsen which got good reviews, and "it all snowballed from there," says Tommy.

"The first show was Greg, Mary, Tom, Dyan and me, then we saved Bob (Joy, now Robert Joy, the acclaimed New York actor) from being a Rhodes Scholar, and then Andy joined," recounts Cathy with her fingers. Others joined on for 'stints', but the core for Codco was formed.

Interviewing Codco is difficult. The five move about as they please, finishing primary work, or chatting/arguing with one another about any number of topics. Mary sits on a table sifting through a pile of photos of past shows, which will form a good part of the planned 'Codco Archives'. The five seem too glad to be back together again — although they've actually never been apart. Each has contributed significantly to the development of theatre downtown in numerous projects. Andy has worked on a number of shows, including his own acclaimed one-man show Out of the Bin, and the perpetually uncompleted Faustus Bidgood, the feature film in which the others also appear. Walsh has written and directed her own shows, as well as taking a strong part in the establishment and growth of the LSPU Hall. Tommy and Greg worked on their own Two Foolish To Talk About and with the Wonderful Grand Band, transforming it from a traditional/folk band with a small following to a province-wide cult. Cathy joined the band with Mary for its last year of existence, and also worked on her own projects, including last year's Late Night Soap at the Hall. Formidable achievements when weighed together, and the group hopes the collective magic will still be there next week when the revived review opens.

Codco itself (the corporate entity, as opposed to 'the truth', explains Andy) has also been active as a company. Although the troupe stopped performing in 1976, the company has managed "to produce something every year," says Tommy, including a few mini-revivals after 1976 with old Codco material being performed by subjects of the troupe.

Considering Bob Joy's renowned success on stage and in film, could there be any jealousy in Codco?

"Yes," says Andy firmly. "Bitter, bitter jealousy."

While the individual members of the troupe, or the ones that still live in the province, have been at least artistically successful, there is also the nagging shadow of Bob Joy, who left Newfoundland in the late 70s, and immediately struck big in New York on Broadway, and then in a series of films — Atlantic City, Ragtime, and most recently as Madonna's punky boyfriend Jim in Desperately Seeking Susan. Could there be any jealousy among the group members?

"Yes," says Andy firmly. "Bitter, bitter jealousy."

"Bob already paid me off," Mary confesses. "The others are bitter, but Bob took me out for a big Italian dinner and gave me lots of booze, so my bitterness is settled." The others giggle, while Cathy adds: "I want Madonna to see those tapes of me and Bob years ago, before she got to kiss him."

Bringing Codco back from theatrical purgatory has solved a few problems that have been nagging the members for years, aside from wanting to perform together again. For one, the group has culled Codco material from many sources, and at last they have a complete (or as close as they might come) catalogue of scripts, photos and tapes. While the Canada Council has talked about publishing some of the material, and the Library at Memorial may transcribe some of the performances, the worth of the collection is self-evident to the group. As well, they don't have to go through the bother of coming up with a new script, although new material may creep into the performance.

"With Codco," Tommy says, "we'd always be writing, right up until the last moment. Often the show would come together on stage. This is a luxury to be able to pick the material and just have to rehearse it."

All of the writing, directing and producing in the old days was shared by the group members ("they call it a 'collective' now," says Cathy wryly), who created such hits as Cod On a Stick, Sickness, Death and Beyond the Grave, Das Kapital, or What Do You Want To See The Harbour For?, and Tale Ends, as well as touring shows such as Laugh Your Guts Out With Total Strangers. The material in the new show hasn't yet been decided on — the preparation to date has been viewing and selecting rather than actual rehearsals.

But who really calls the shots? It depends on who you listen to. Half of them answer 'me', while they all contribute various superlatives — the bossiest, the sauciest, and the oldest, take your pick.

There's also another reason for the Codco revival — as Cathy puts it, "to put things in perspective." Not just for themselves, but for the arts community, the city, and the entire arts structure/government funding complex. It's quite a boast, but one the members believe in wholeheartedly. Never been known to remain quiet on any number of social and political issues — the material in the shows speaks for that well enough — Codco also has many axes to grind with the way the arts system in this province, and in a larger sense, the country, works — even with the quality of support the press provides.

"We had a problem before with reviewers with shows that the audiences loved, but . . ." says Cathy.

"There's a desperate need for intelligent criticism in this city," echoes Greg.

"It's so ridiculous with the people that are writing the reviews — like Linda Rimsay, who's in the pocket of the Arts and Culture Centre. Their name is actually on her paycheque, and she's writing reviews of Rising Tide shows. It's just not fair," says Tommy, before he catches a second wind. "And Philip Hicks should never be allowed to take a pen in hand!"

On a larger scale, the members of Codco recognize more serious problems facing the arts industry. "It's just starting to dawn on the government here that they should perhaps be involved in funding the arts," says Greg. "They never did anything before."

Cathy summarizes the major funding plight faced by arts groups here or anywhere else: "The government will give the most money to the people who do the most lobbying, in the political kind of sense."

"It comes down to the artists who are the ones who are writing and performing all the time," says Tommy, "and the ones who are good at the paperwork are getting the money."

Such as Rising Tide theatre, which managed to snare a handsome deal with the provincial government, while other arts groups are forced to live on less-than-shoestring budgets. However, Mary says, "it's better for the government to at least be giving money to Rising Tide than bringing over ninth rate English touring companies."

"The arts scene here has grown completely in spite of the government, not because of it," says Greg. "It might as well be the government of Ontario." After thinking for a moment, he adds, "actually, I'm sure we've received more help from the government of Ontario than from here."

If the Codco revival matches the success of the individual efforts of the group's members, it should sell out, which it probably will. However, the members haven't made any commitments to future projects together just right — the water has to be tested first, or again. As well, Greg and Tommy are awaiting word on the pilot they have just finished for CBC for a national program, and Mary is planning the 10th anniversary of theatre at the LSPU Hall next year, including revivals of past hits. And Andy also has the nasty business of helping to finish up the editing of Faustus Bidgood, the rough print of which is hilarious on any measure. But for now, the members of Codco are just watching television monitors, and reliving a bit of their past.

An inside look at the religious Right

by JOHN GUSHUE

No other political or social movement has grown as strong and as powerful, nor so quickly, as the Born Again movement in North America. When it first came to prominence in the 70s, the movement seemed more of a bizarre slice of American pie than the harbinger of conservative dogma it would become, what with its baptisms in swimming pools, and the quirky, oddball behaviour of TV evangelists who at first appeared to be updated versions of the travelling preachers of days gone by.

Freelance writer Judith Haiven, Jewish and a 'secular humanist', as the Born Again would call her, began tackling the movement several years ago and continued her investigation via articles in the Toronto Star, Maclean's, the Canadian Churchman and others. Following some additions and revisions, Haiven has collected her work to Faith, Hope, No Charity, a book that provides an in-depth analysis of a potent and politically persuasive coalition of religious groups that has already redefined the modern status and connection between church and state. While Born Again groups have little in common with other Christian groups, the movement has also made clear steps in establishing itself at the forefront of modern Christian theory, although the movement in practice often tends to stray from common Christian ideals and values.

The movement's symbolic, if not genuine, leader is Jerry Falwell, the founder of the Moral Majority and the leading edge in the current trend in politicized evangelism, in which Falwell, who travels the country in down-home "I Love America" rallies, champions his political causes as much as he praises his savior. In fact, Haiven notes, Falwell's emphasis when not pressuring the faithful to following his dogma is to attain as much self-sufficiency as possible with hi-tech fundraising drives and heart-tugging computerized direct mail appeals, simulated to be personal mailouts from Falwell's own desk. Falwell also keeps intricate records of his drive, the ultimate rationale being to attract more funding.

There are others like Falwell — Canada's own David Mainse, Pat Robertson of the Christian Broadcasting Network ("the Dick Cavett of television evangelists"), and Born Again Nixon aide and ex-con Charles Colson, whose own bizarre case is documented in the chapter, "For He's a Jolly Good Felon." Haiven also takes the reader to Washington for a Pray-In For Jesus, through the television stations and mansions of the evangelistic elite, and even through one woman's horror story of being recruited into one cult and the struggle to break free.

Haiven's testimony is pretty stark; it is difficult to feel any sympathy for the subjects of the book, and often one wonders why the religious right has become so popular so quickly. This type of analysis is missing from the book, as well as any glimpse at the obviously wide audience in which Falwell and the others have found such a goldmine. Nevertheless, the book makes for interesting reading on a subject very poorly researched, and when done so often with a heavy bias for and against. Finding the book in town is difficult, but may be found in a number of alternative shops off the island or through ordering it via a local shop.

Firebugs conflagration of humour and absurdity

Whether you have a burning desire for blazing entertainment or just a need to rekindle a smouldering interest in the theatre, you're sure to get a warm reception at MUN Drama's presentation of The Firebugs.

The drama is by playwright Max Frisch and might be described as a conflagration of humour, absurdity and chilling reality in a modern setting. Frisch has gotten rave reviews in Europe but it is only recently that his work has begun to spark interest in North America. According to the play's director David Scott, "Frisch makes Woody Allen look like a nobody!"

The Firebugs is MUN Drama's first production this year and it stars Peter Jackson, Moya Smith and a truck-load of firemen. It continues tonight and Saturday at 8:00 p.m. at MUN's Little Theatre, with special rates for students.

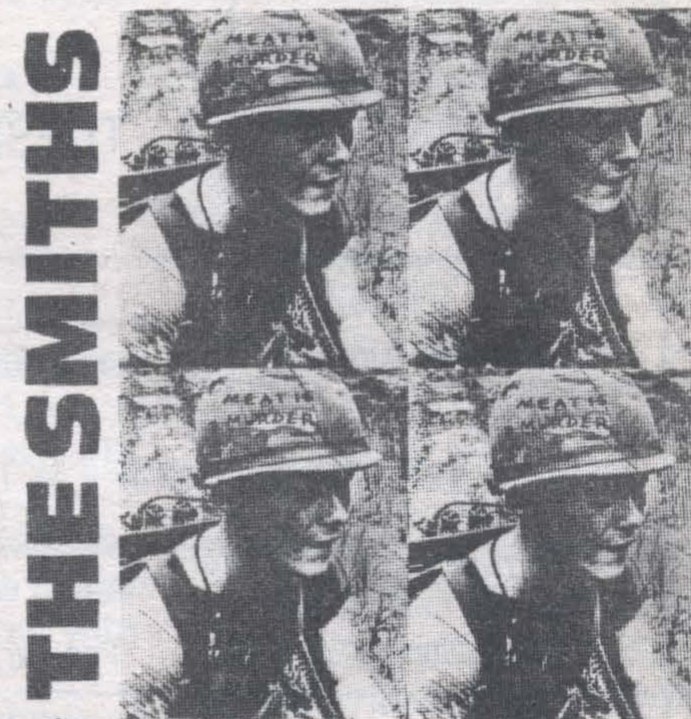

Smiths: militant veggies

by JOHN GUSHUE

At last — an anthem for militant vegetarians. Actually, the latest album by the Smiths is more than just a collection of slogans, it's also a collection of superior songwriting and intriguing musicianship. Although wildly popular in Britain (Best group in the last New Musical Express readers' poll), the Smiths have yet to make so much as a dent in mainstream North America, although the band has attracted a wide yet silent audience.

Clumped together with the likes of Aztec Camera (for inventive songwriting), Lloyd Cole (for the intelligence and depth of same) and other acoustic/basic oriented groups (for obvious reasons), the Smiths are quite a striking band. Singer/lyricist Morrissey has a poet's flair and a deep comprehension of the traditions of pathos and tragedy, and these are brought straight to the front with both sharpness and clarity. The songs on Meat Is Murder are about cruelty, violence, and pain, yet in spite of the negativism the imagery provokes, there is also a sentiment of hope, such as in the Joycean "Rusholme Ruffians", about robbery and violence against the young.

The music, all written by guitarist Johnny Marr, is equally as melancholic, and just as inventive. From the driving "What She Said" to the hypnotizing "How Soon Is Now?", the Smiths would be an interesting group even without the presence of Morrissey, who actually adds quite a bit to the songs. Although his voice is no great instrument on its own terms, Morrissey has the ability to add the proper emotions to a song — most particularly noticeable on the title cut, when he sings in almost restrained hysteria, and the flesh you so fancifully fry, is not succulent, tasty or nice, it's death for no reason, and death for no reason — is MURDER

Unfortunately, the Smiths won't be too successful in North America due to their lack of overtly commercial, radio-oriented material, and thank God for that.

We need writers.

The Muse needs writers - lots of them. If you have a little (or a lot) talent and a little (or a lot) of time, come on up to the Muse offices, 2001 Thomson Student Centre. If you don't know where to start, we can fix you up with the story ideas and the equipment you'll need.

The Muse. Well worth looking into.

CFS out of the red, but not out of the woods

Halifax (CUP) — The Canadian Federation of Students is seeing a lot of black ink these days, in spite of a large deficit from previous years and losses of important referenda.

The national student lobby group had a surplus of almost $90,000 this year even with the loss of a similar amount in fees from the University of Alberta, said CFS chairperson Barb Donaldson.

"Finances are good this year, contrary to earlier reports," said Donaldson. "We will continue to embark on a frugal budgetary course."

At the recent general meeting in Halifax, members of CFS approved the budget and relevant motions as a package with little debate.

The financial plan includes raising the cost of the International Student Identity cards from $5 to $7.50 and channeling $1.50 from each sale into the political budget. The group expects to raise almost $25,000 this way.

Donaldson said she was surprised the budget was passed as a package because at previous conferences, money had been a source of contention. She said this year much of the budget discussion occurred at the committee level.

At the same general meeting, members overwhelmingly approved a working agreement between CFS and the Ontario Federation of Students after much discussion. OFS broke congruency with the national federation last fall. Congruency is where a member institution must belong to both the provincial and national student organizations.

Debate focussed on the clause which said OFS fieldworkers would have to support the yes side in a CFS pullout referendum. Some members, particularly those from the British Columbia caucus, believed this agreement threatened the structure of the group.

Donaldson said she was pleased to see the agreement pass. "It was, absolutely the best deal we could get with OFS. I think it will pass at the OFS plenary (in June)."

Donaldson said the agreement should be made with every provincial arm as it spelled out the responsibilities between the two partners.

"In the past, too many hard feelings have developed because people did not understand what was expected of them," she said.

Women still debased in national media

by BETH RYAN

Women are not being portrayed realistically or positively in the Canadian media, according to a major study released by the National Watch On Images of Women in the Media (MediaWatch) Inc.

"This research shows us once again, down to percentage points, that women's place in the media is largely confined to very limiting and often debasing roles," said Janna Taylor, national director of MediaWatch.

MediaWatch began as a sub-committee of the National Action Committee on the Status of Women and developed into a national women's organization which aims to improve the image of women and girls in media. The organization sponsored the monitoring study, Sex-Role Stereotyping: A Content Analysis of Radio and Television, which was conducted by researcher Ana Wiggins.

Sex-Role Stereotyping is the broadest study of sexism in the media to date and illustrates the wide range of sexism that exists in radio and television programs and advertisements. Information was gathered from across the country during two individual periods of media monitoring and compiled in a 223-page report.

Diane Hollett, regional representative of MediaWatch in Newfoundland, said this study attempts to monitor change over time by conducting the research in two phases. The CRTC conducted its own study to present at the CRTC self-regulation hearings in September.

"However, we are not clear whether the CRTC report deals with two phases as ours does and if it shows change over time," said Hollett.

MediaWatch designed this study in part for the CRTC hearings on sex-role stereotyping. The CRTC established a two-year self-regulation period for the broadcast industry which ended in 1984. During that period, the industry had the opportunity to regulate itself instead of conforming to a regulatory code. The hearings in September will determine whether self-regulation was successful or if the industry will have to be regulated by another body.

According to the data in the MediaWatch report, self-regulation has not worked, Hollett said.

"In our study, we found that there was a small amount of positive change and a lot of negative change in the image of women in the media," said Hollett.

The study revealed that women were under-represented in on-air roles in radio and television news, as newscasters, interviewers, interviewees, eyewitnesses, experts, and hosts. In television advertisements, men were the product presenters and did the voice-overs twice as much as women. In television drama and situation comedy, men were presented as manager/executive, physician, law enforcement and business owner while women were seen as homemakers, clerical-office workers and students. Men were shown in positions of power and authority while women were powerless, the survey found.

Hollett says her goal as regional representative is to make Newfoundland aware of the problem of sex-role stereotyping in the media.

"I'm interested in bringing this problem to the forefront and making people aware of the negative portrayal of women in the media," said Hollett, a volunteer at the Women's Centre on campus, and a third year political science major.

Hollett said it is very important to reach youth on the subject of sexism in the media, especially in rock videos. Hollett agrees with Janna Taylor in that people must understand that sexism is being either wittingly or unwittingly taught through inaccurate and distorted media images.

Hollett urges the public to complain when they see or hear sexism in the media.

"As members of the general public and as consumers, we have the right to complain about negative and stereotypical portrayals in the media," Hollett said.

Hollett said people can obtain a complaint form at the Women's Resource Centre which will be sent to MediaWatch's national office in Vancouver and then forwarded to the network or publication involved.

MUNFA to propose salary solution soon

by KARL MOORES

The MUN Faculty Association doesn't yet have a position on salary discrimination against women faculty, but according to president Mark Graesser, they expect to make recommendations to the university in a few months.

"What we will be concerned with in formulating our opinion is how to correct this anomaly," he said.

The disparities were revealed in a recent report by William Schrank of the department of Economics. The report said that women faculty were paid approximately $1800 - $1900 less than their male counterparts.

"This is a serious problem," said Graesser. "I think MUNFA and the administration would both agree on that."

Before Graesser and the remainder of the MUNFA executive arrive at a decision on their course of action, the problem will be studied by the Status of Academic Women

Committee and the Academic Freedom and Grievance Committee, both MUNFA standing committees that will report back to the executive.

"It could be a few months before we come up with a firm proposal on how to deal with this," Graesser said.

After MUNFA formulates its position it will make recommendations to the university administration in an effort to end discrimination in wages. But MUNFA is somewhat limited in what it can do.

"We can't act as a union. We must try to act with reason and fairness," Graesser said.

After studying a similar report, by the same author, ten years ago, MUNFA recognized that substantial salary bias existed against women. "MUNFA recommended to the administration that the anomalies be corrected and they were not," said Graesser. A statement should be forthcoming in a few months.

Nationalist professor spurned by Simon Fraser university

OTTAWA (CUP) — A Carleton University English professor is calling for public action against Simon Fraser University after it refused to accept his application for an exchange position.

Professor Robin Mathews was rejected because of his "cultural and literary nationalism."

Jerald Zaslove, chairperson of SFU's English department, said most of the department's votes against Mathews came from a desire to avoid trouble.

"The department did not want to take the chance that he would use the department as a platform. This is a tolerant and liberal department; however... too many threatening elements converged at once," said Zaslove in his rejection letter to Mathews.

Plans for the exchange between Mathews and Professor Bruce Nesbitt began late last year. Carleton's department of English and the Faculty of Arts approved the plan without any reservations. It was also approved by SFU's Dean of Arts, the chairperson of the English Department, and the appointment committee, but when it was taken to the English department for ratification, the exchange was rejected by a vote of 23 to 13.

Mathews has sent a letter to universities across the country saying, "I believe action against Simon Fraser is necessary if fundamental freedoms in Canada are to be upheld."

In his letter, Mathews said he suspects he was not rejected because of legitimate academic concerns as SFU's

English department claims, but because of fears of American professors in the department.

Mathews said of the 37 professors within the department, 18 are Americans.

"The original vote against me seemed to be a vote by Americans against someone who might make them uncomfortable with their continuing central role in a Canadian university."

Mathews also said members of the English department were resentful of their colleague, Professor Nesbitt, who had been on many previous exchanges.

Douglas Wurtele, Carleton's chairperson of the English department, said he was "astonished" by the rejection.

"Here is a Canadian university, funded almost entirely by the Canadian taxpayers, who turns down a professor because of literary and cultural nationalism," said Wurtele.

Wurtele said Mathews has been a long time advocate of increasing Canadian content in university and high school curricula. He has also been "instrumental in making vacancies (teaching positions) in Canada available to Canadians."

Wurtele says Mathews "has done the cause of education in Canada a great service. Twenty years ago, it was impossible to write a Masters thesis at a Canadian university on Canadian literature." Wurtele said while Mathews has not been solely responsible for the change, Mathews' campaign has been "beneficial."

MUN students debate on PBS

The United States should develop a joint Star Wars program with the Soviet Union to prevent accidental nuclear war.

Or so says the University of Arizona debating team.

Two debaters from Memorial University, Simon Lono and Linda Strowbridge, participated in one of 13 debates to be televised on PBS in the fall and on CBC during National Education Week. They debated with the University of Arizona on the subject of banning all space based weapons systems. The U of A team edged out the Memorial team in a two to one vote of the judges.

The Memorial Team opened the debate by arguing that any such system would only escalate the arms race because technology would not solve political problems and the natural Soviet response to such a construct would be an immediate arms build-up.

The judges were a mix of American and Canadian journalists and experts in the relevant fields. In this debate, the judges were an American journalist, a Washington correspondent for the Globe and Mail and the director of the Institute of Strategic Studies at Georgetown University in Washington.

The Memorial team received a strong 'yes' vote and two reluctant 'no' votes.

Thanks Memorial!

We'd like to say thank you! You keep coming back and that's important! It shows us you care about the quality and personal service we provide.

We realize that you, as individuals, know what you want from your eyewear. Whether it's contact lenses or fashionable frames, you know your eyes deserve the best possible care.

You proved it! Quality is still the best bargain around.

For expert advice in eye care.

The Muse needs brains - both left and right hemispheres. We also need people to manage the regular production of a student newspaper (biweekly during summer months) through any means they see fit - from writing a story to taking a picture to sorting files to making coffee. We welcome anyone with an interest in journalism, design, or just doing something constructive. Brains interested in more unusual behaviour won't be turned away either....
