

Letter from UNB profs:

In response to the recent article by Nick Robins-Early, "Ricardo Duchesne Is A University Of New Brunswick Professor. He's Also A White Supremacist," of March 18, 2019, we the undersigned faculty members from the University of New Brunswick wish to unreservedly condemn Professor Ricardo Duchesne's views about multiculturalism and immigration as racist and without academic merit. In this view, we are joined by the larger academic community. None of Professor Duchesne's writings on these topics have been published by established peer reviewed academic journals or publishers.

We are proud to work in a university that takes academic freedom seriously and we are acutely aware of the special responsibilities that come with a faculty position. It is important to remember that academic freedom does not protect from condemnation by peers or the public. Indeed, it is a hallmark of academic freedom that one's views are subject to critique. Faculty, students, staff and the wider public have the right to publicly condemn Dr. Duchesne's racism. We are exercising that right.

Racism in the university causes real harm and undermines the rights of students and colleagues to a working and learning environment free from discrimination. We are deeply concerned about the negative impact that his polemics may have on all students in his courses, and especially Indigenous and racialized students. We therefore publically and explicitly condemn Duchesne's racist polemics on multiculturalism and immigration and point out that his status as a professor at UNB in no way lends academic legitimacy to his views on these topics.

Signed:

Funké Aladejebi (Gender & Women's Studies/History), Mustapha Ibn Boamah (Economics), Tia Dafnos (Sociology), Christopher Doran (Social Sciences), Daniel Downes (Social Sciences), Hadi Eslami (Business), Cheryl Fury (History), Rod Hill (Economics), Virginia Hill (Linguistics), Cathy Holtmann (Sociology), Jula Hughes (Law), Stefanie Hunt-Kennedy (History), Viqar Husain (Mathematics), Sean Kennedy (History), Debra J. Lindsay (History), Elizabeth Mancke (History), Marc Milner (History), Erin Morton (History), Janet Mullin (History), Karen Pearlston (Law), Matthew Sears (Classics), Lisa M. Todd (History), Gary K. Waite (History), Robert Whitney (History), Julia Woodhall-Melnik (Social Sciences)

=====

Reply from Ricardo Duchesne:

It is rather rich for the academics who signed this letter to claim that the "hallmark of academic freedom" is to subject views to criticism while at the same time seeking to deny my right to criticize the mandated ideology of diversity and mass immigration. None of the individuals who signed this letter has any scholarly background in the subject of Canadian immigration or multiculturalism. In contrast, I have a 369 page book, Canada in Decay: Mass Immigration, Diversity, and the Ethnocide of Euro-Canadians. This book has been a best seller at Amazon since it was published in August 2017, with numerous customer reviews praising its scholarship and extensive research. They say that my views on this subject are not peer reviewed. This book was released by a small publisher, that is true. But the fact is that not a single establishment publisher was willing to consider my initial proposal for this book, for the simple reason that academics have created a hostile environment against any dissenter who questions the globalist enforcement of immigrant diversity. My book, The Uniqueness of Western Civilization, was reviewed extensively by standard peer review journals. It is unfortunate that these academics repeat old, tired labels against me intended to close off any debate about immigration that does not conform to the views of corporations, banks, and white privileged academics. I am sorry to disappoint them, but as an immigrant from Puerto Rico I will continue to exercise my academic freedom to engage in the type of critical thinking universities were originally intended to encourage. The use of undefined labels intended to ostracise critical thinkers goes against the spirit of scholarship that I respect.